PHONOGRAPHY, or WRITING BY SOUND!!

PHONOGRAPHY was invented by ISAAC PITMAN, of Bath, England, in the year 1837. It is the most simple, most natural, most rapid, and most easily learned system of writing which has ever been, or ever can be invented.

During the past fifteen years, hundreds of thousands of persons, in England and America, in both public and private life, have learned to write Phonography, and thousands of social and business letters annually pass through the post office.

Nor is the great popularity to be wondered at. The present system of writing is exceedingly cumbersome, and totally unworthy these days of progress and invention. Phonography is equally as legible, can be learned in one twentieth the time, and can be written six times as fast! In other words, the labor of six days can be performed in one—one man can do the work of six; So simple is the system, too, that a person may learn to write it slowly, in a couple of hours. An hour's daily practice for a few weeks will enable any person to write Phonography with certainty, and with some degree of freedom. The same amount of practice continued for six months will enable a person to take reports of speeches, lectures, sermons, or conversation, and to read them with accuracy.

The late Hon. THOS. H. BURTON, upon being presented with a verbatim report of one of his masterly speeches, taken by a little boy only twelve years of age, said: "Had this art been known 40 years ago it would have saved me 20 years hard labor." The learned Senator spoke but a portion of the truth. What long-hand requires six years to accomplish, Phonography will perform in one.

To clergymen, Editors, Physicians, Lawyers, Secretaries, Conveyancers, Law and Medical Students, Lecturers, Printers, School Teachers, Merchants, School Boys and Girls, a knowledge of Phonography is of vast utility. In fact there is no profession or calling in which it is not useful, and the young man's education can be considered complete without it.

During the past 8 months hundreds of persons in Canada, of every point in life, have adopted the art, from many of whom the author has received most cordial and unsolicited letters, expressive of their delight with the attainment, and the extraordinary ease with which they have acquired it.

For the purpose of aiding in the dissemination of so important a reform in his own country, the subscriber is now prepared to supply all who apply, with the MANUAL OF PHONOGRAPHY, and the PHONOGRAPHIC COPY BOOK, sent by mail to any part of the Province, postage pre-paid, for the small sum of ONE DOLLAR.

Anybody and every body, who can learn anything can learn PHONOGRAPHY from the MANUAL without other assistance. Those who wish to be able to put their thoughts to paper at the rate of from 100 to 250 words per minute, should send for the above-mentioned works at once. The instruction given by the Manual is as plain as A, B, C, and two times as easy to understand.

"THE CANADIAN PHONETIC PIONEER" Is a Monthly Journal, devoted to the advocacy of the Reform. Price 25 cents per annum.

Address, (post-paid)

$100 A YEAR,

AND upwards saved to the Farmers, by ALDUS MOWRY'S

CHOP CRINDER.

This Machine has just been patented, and has great advantages over any other for the same purpose, now known or in use. It is so simple that any farmer can use it, and it requires but a small amount of power to drive it, two horse power being sufficient; with this amount of power of any kind, it will grind from 15 to 25 bushels of Oats per hour. The grain is ground or rather cut by cast-steel cutters, which are so fitted into the Machine, that they can easily be taken out and repaired at a trifling cost.

All sorts of Grain can be ground without altering or adjusting the Machine.

PRICE $50.

All orders directed to "M. Mowry, Ashburnham, Peterborough," will be promptly attended to.

The inventor, Aldus Mowry, will sell to any one desiring it, the right to manufacture and sell the Machine in any limited locality.

Address, "Aldus Mowry, Peterboro', C. W."

Selected Poetry.

My Canadian Home.

BY SAMUEL P. FORD.

I would not change my native home
For country gay, 'neath monarch's dome,
This forest land that gave me birth—
For all the fairest scenes of earth,
And nought shall tempt me e'er to break
The spell that binds my heart to thee,
Or bid me joy and pleasure seek—
In climes beyond the dark blue sea.

I love the grandeur of thy woods,
Those silent solemn solitudes;
The shadow of those leafy aisles
Where rich old nature ever smiles.
I love to wander through the groves
Where oft the dark-eyed Indian trod
And gaze, while thus my spirit roves
Through Nature—up to Nature's God.

Unequalled bliss my spirit takes,
In gazing o'er thy hills—lit lakes,
Whose azure waters ever roar
In tuneful notes along thy shore.
I love to glide in light canoe
Along thy sparkling breast of waves
And mark the distant isles of blue
That parts thee from yon land of slaves.

Thy roaring cataracts I love
Which echo through the dome above
And speak in thunder notes abroad
Their architect,—the mighty God.
While glittering rays of radiant dyes
Bask in an iris fretted zone,
Traced by the Artist of the skies
Athwart the canopy—are thrown.

For other climes their wealth may boast,
The cultured field, the sheltered coast;
Bright sunny skies o'er fertile plains,
High towering fastness, and classic fanes;
Wide rivers circling massive walls
Where potentates in grandeur dwell;
Or shrines in ivied abbey halls,
Where pilgrims ceaselessly knell.

But Canada! thy sons can boast
A wealth those regions long have lost;
A priceless boon—the sparkling gem
Of freedom, forfeited by them.
That prize, inalienably yours,
Gives to toy woodlands double worth
And for thy free-born sons secures
This fairest heritage on earth.

Proud of a home upon thy soil,
I labor on in cheerful toil;
My brightest hope—my highest aim—
Connected with thy future fame.
Thrice happy if I may but give
One ray of light to gild thy sky,
Contented in thy shadow live—
And calmly on thy bosom die.

—Peterborough, October, 1859.

MADAME SCANDAL.

A very long, long time ago in the western part of New England, there lived an aged couple whose time had passed away since early youth, in the every day rounds of farm life, and who never have been known to have the least ill-feeling toward each other since the time old Parson Harold had united them in the bands of wedlock, twenty-five years before. So well was the fact of their conjugal happiness known, that they were spoken of far and near, as the happest pair known. Now, the Devil (excuse the abrupt mention of his name) had been trying for twenty years to make, what is commonly called a "fuss in the family," between these companions. But, much to his mortification, he had not been able to induce the old gentleman to grumble about breakfast being too late once, or the old lady to give a single curtain lecture.—After repeated efforts, the Devil became discouraged, and had he not been a person of great determination, he would doubtless have given up the work in despair. One day as he walked along in a very surly mood, after another attempt to get the old lady to quarrel about the pigs getting into the yard, he met an old woman, a neighbor of the old couple. As Mr. Devil and the neighbor were very particular friends, they must needs stop on the way to chat a bit.

"Good morning, sir; and pray what makes you look so sorely this beautiful morning? Isn't the controversy between the two churches doing good service?"

"Yes."

"Isn't Deacon W. making plenty of bad whisky?"

"Yes."

"Well, what is the matter, my mighty honored master?"

"Everything else is going on well enough," replied the Devil, "but"—and he looked as sour as a sick monkey on a crab apple tree,—"old Blanford and his wife, over there, are injuring the cause terribly by their bad example, and after trying for years to induce them to do better, I must say that I consider them hopeless."

The old hag stood for a moment in deep thought. "Are you sure that you have tried every way?"

"Every way that I can think of."

"Are you certain?"

"Yes."

"Well," said she, "if you will promise to make me a present of a new pair of shoes if I succeed, I will make the attempt myself, and see if I can raise a quarrel between them."

To this reasonable request the Devil gladly assented. The old hag went her way to neighbor Blanford's house, and found Mrs. Blanford busily engaged in getting things ready for her husband's comfort on his return from work. After the usual compliments had passed, the following dialogue took place.

"Well, friend B., you and Mr. B. have lived a long time together."

"Five-and-twenty years come next November," replied Mrs. B.

"And all this time you have never had the least quarrel."

"Not one."

"I am truly glad to hear it," continued the hag. "I consider it my duty to warn you that though this may be the case, you must not expect to be so always.—Have you not observed of late that Mr. B. has grown peevish and sullen at times?"

"A very little so," observed Mrs. Blanford.

"I know it," continued the hag, "and let me warn you in time so be on your guard."

Mrs. B. did think she had better do so, and asked advice how she had better manage the case.

"Shame you not scold?" said the hag. "that your husband has a bunch of long, coarse hair growing on a mole, under the chin, on the side of the throat?"

"Yes."

"Then are the cause of trouble, and as long as they remain you had better look out. Now, as a friend, I would advise you to cut them the first time you have a chance, and then end the trouble."

"If you say so, I will," replied the credulous old lady.

Soon after this the hag started for home, and made it convenient to meet Mr. B. on the way. Much the same talk in relation to his domestic happiness passed between them, as did between her and the woman.

"But, friend Blanford," said she, "I think it my duty as a Christian, to warn you to be on your guard, for I tell you your wife intends your ruin."

Old Mr. B. was very much astonished yet he could not wholly discredit her words. When he reached home he threw himself upon a bed in great perplexity, and forgoing sleep, studied the matter in his own mind. His wife, thinking this a good opportunity for cutting off the obnoxious hair, took her husband's razor and crept softly to his side. Now the old lady was very much frightened at holding a razor so close to her husband's throat, and her hand was not as steady as it once was; so, between the two, she went to work very awkwardly and pulled the hairs instead of cutting them. Mr. B. opened his eyes and there stood his wife, with a razor at his throat! After what had been told him, and seeing this, he could not doubt that she intended to murder him. He sprang from his bed in horror, and no explanation or entreaty could convince him to the contrary. So, from that time forth there was no more peace in that house. It was jag, jag, quarrelling and wrangling all the time.

With delight the Devil heard of the success of the faithful emissary, and sent her word that if she would meet him at the end of the lawn, at a certain time, he would pay her the shoes.

At the appointed time she repaired to the spot, and found the Devil at the place. He put the shoes on the end of a long pole, and standing on the opposite side of the fence, handed them over to her. She was very much pleased with them: they were exactly the article.

"But there is one thing, Mr. Devil, I would like to have explained—that is, why you heed them to me on a stick?"

"Very easy to explain," replied he, "any one who has the cunning and meanness to do as you have done, don't get nearer than twenty feet of me? So saying, he fled in terror.

After a while the old woman died, and when she applied for admittance to the lower regions, the devil would not let her in, for fear she might dethrone him, as she was his superior. So the old woman is yet compelled to wander over the world, raising quarrels and strife in peaceful families and neighborhoods.

Would you like to know her name?

It is Madam Scandal! When she died, her children, the young Scandalizers, were left orphans, but the Devil, in consideration of past service done by the mother, adopted them; so you see he is the father of that respectable class called scandal-mongers.

How Many have Lived.

Exaggerated statements in regard to the past population of our globe, are not unfrequently heard from the pulpit and elsewhere; and though the matter is of no great importance in itself, yet if used, as it sometimes is, for the purpose of illustrating and enforcing truth, it is better to state it truly. The present population is estimated at about 1,000,000,000, and if we suppose it to have been the same through the whole of the past 6,000 years, and a generation to have passed away every 30 years, both of which suppositions are be yond the truth, if we take the average for the entire period, we shall have but 200,000,000,000, for the past population, instead of 36,627,842,000. The space required for interring this reduced number would be but 195,212½ square miles, or about four times the area of the State of Pennsylvania.

THE CITADEL AT QUEBEC.—A correspondent, writing from Quebec, then depicts the famous citadel:—

"When its massive walls were erected, so great was the draft on the treasury of France that the Queen asked if they were building it of gold! This frowning fortress stands 400 feet above the river, and has been appropriately called the "Gibraltar of America." It includes about 40 acres on the summit of Cape Diamond. The mount is composed chiefly of dark slate rock, with veins of quartz crystal, sparkling like diamonds; hence the name. In its deep vaults are deposited fifty seven thousand tons of powder. Four Martello towers forty feet high, stand upon the plains about half a mile in advance of the other fortifications. This old walled city has a dark, dingy and forbidding appearance, and one feels on entering its low and massive gates, as if he were going into prison."

A LAWYER'S OATH.—The following oath, administered to legal gentlemen when admitted to the bar, passed the Massachusetts Senate by a vote of 12 to 3:—

"You solemnly swear that you will do no falsehood, nor consent to the doing of any in court; you will not wittingly or willingly promote or sue any false, groundless or unlawful suit, nor give your aid nor consent to the same; you will delay no man for lucre or malice; but you will conduct yourself in the office of an attorney within the court, according to the best of your knowledge and discretion, and with all good fidelity, as well to the courts as to your clients.—So help you God."

Vulcanized India rubber is found to be the best material for the manufacture of flutes.

Her Majesty has been pleased to confer the honor of Knighthood upon the Chief Justice of New Brunswick, now Sir James Carden.

There are twenty thousand county bishops in England, each larger than Bishop Potter's house at Washington.

Hurting the New-York Post?

The Post's account of this man gives but a faint picture of him. I will give you one from real life:—

Ten years ago, I was seated in my office at No. 12, Wall-street, busily driving the quill, when I heard a quiet [illegible] and then a mild voice inquiring if I had the transcript of a certain judgment against one J. G. O., the proprietor of the great Pegche-wun-wah Company for selling Indian medicines. I looked up, and saw a man whose twisted foot and palsied arms were quite familiar to me, but of whose name or calling, I knew nothing.

"Yes," I replied, 'I have the transcript.'

"Well, I want it," he said, "I'm going to collect it for the creditor."

"Going to collect it?" I exclaimed, "why the judgment is perfectly [illegible] Executions, and proceedings after [illegible] and all ordinary means of grace, have long ago been exhausted upon O. He is hopelessly insolvent, and is, besides, the most adroit scamp of a swindler I ever encountered."

"What's that to me?" broke out the visiter, in a gruff, strong voice, quite different from his first tones. "Perhaps you don't know who I am. I'm Berling, the man about town. You a lawyer and don't know me! Sheriffs are good for nothing; constables are good for nothing; executors and creditors' bills are good for nothing.—Give me the transcript—here's the order for it—I'll make the money out of him."

I swiveled around my chair and stared at the man. "And will you be so good, Mr. Berling," I asked, "as to tell me what your patent plan for superseding officers and writs, and for squeezing blood out of turnips, and cash out of the President of the Peg-che-wun-wah company?

"How I do it you mean. Why I don 'em at their houses, I don 'em in the street, I don 'em at the theatre, I don 'em in church I catch 'em early in the morning, and stick to 'em all day; follow 'em wherever they go; go to meals and eat with 'em; go to bed and sleep with 'em; give 'em no peace night or day, Sunday nor week day; stick to 'em like death to a dead nigger. A man owes a debt: He won't pay it. I follow him all the week so he can't do any business, nor go to see his sweetheart, nor walk in Broadway, nor eat with any appetite, nor sleep without dreaming. I'm after him with the devil to run him down. All this won't do?" Very well when he goes to church on Sunday, he finds me in his pew [Yours sheriffs can't work on Sunday—I do my best business then.] The congregation rises, and he rises, takes out his book opens at the place, and there he finds the bill I've stuck there, and gets so mad he can't say amen.'

"Sheriffs and constables," continued he getting loud and fierce, "will a sheriff go off a Sunday morning to a parson's house and follow him to church, and walk up[the broad aisle with him before all the congregation, and go up the pulpit stairs close to his heels, and slip into the pulpit after him before he can[shut the door, and take a seat by his side, and get up when he gets up, and when he opens the Bible, open John Jones bill full length, and lay it down on the chapter and verse, and tell him: There's that bill of horse hire—pay it before you preach! But that's what I did—and I got my money, too.'

"And what commission did you charge?"

"Fifty per cent."

"Rather strong," I suggested, "but still your mode of procedure was strong. Do you often get as much as fifty per cent."

"When I earn it I get it. Dr. C., of Broadway, sent me to dun a fellow who lived in a back yard, and kept two bull-dogs that he let loose when anybody came to collect an honest debt. I went to him with a horse pistol in each hand and Dr. C.'s bill in my teeth, and made him pay up.—What did Dr. C. offer me for getting the sixty dollars?—he offered me one dollar. If won't take it, says I. I'll pay no more says he. Pay me thirty dollars, says I.—Clear out, says he, and he kicked me out of his door and down the steps into Broadway. I goes across to the —— hotel and hires a great arm chair out of the barroom, and takes it across the street and plants it on the curb-stone right opposite Dr. C.'s office door, and I lays the bill I had made out on a full sheet of foolscap across my knees, hanging down so everybody that went by could read in large black masked letters:

Doctor C.,
To J. Berling, Dr.
For collecting of Richard Roe:
Commission.....$30 00

And all the crowd kept stopping to read as their there was all the while two or three hundred people standing on the Doctor's premises and reading into my bill and then in sign, and making their jokes. I had hired the chair for the whole afternoon, but he hadn't stood this more than fifteen minutes before he comes to the door, and says, "Come here, you rascal;" and I went: and took thirty dollars of his money, and left the bill remarked."

"But, my friend, don't your impudent ways often get you into scrapes: are you not afraid some one will some day break your head?"

"Break whose head?" he thundered.—"Didn't Col. S. of New Orleans, a man that's killed seven men in duels, when I went to dun him at the Astor House—didn't he grab me by the stock of the breeches, and hold me out of the fifth story window, and shake me there above the pavement, and say, 'Shall I let you fall and break your neck on the stones, or take you in and dun you down stairs?'

"Well," said I coolly, "what did you do then?"

"What did I do? I said 'pay me that money I said didn't he pull me in and pay me every cent?"

The intensity of his manner, as he thus related his exploits, cannot be rendered on paper—especially when he accented with clenched teeth and the fingers of his upraised right hand—"pay me that money?"

He took the manuscript and tramped off. In another day the bailiff's debtor, and ready match for all the regular thump-bumpers of the law, came in to beg piteously I would call off the blood-hound. I told him it was the creditor's affair, not mine. Next day I met Berling at the corner of Cortlandt-street, looking mild and happy, and asked him how he succeeded. "I haven't got it yet" was the reply. "He hasn't found me out but he has just paid me five dollars to let him dine at the hotel down there, without my company. We've taken all our meals together for the past few days, and he began to find his appetite fail.'

Was Bunyan a Plagiarist?

A French newspaper, published in this city, lately contained an article, in which the singular announcement was made, that the "Pilgrim's Progress," which the world has so long considered to be the work of John Bunyan, is in reality, the production of a French clergyman, named G. de Grideville, who lived in the fifteenth century. It says that a young woman, Miss Catherine Isabella Cart, has lately published in London, a translation of an old French manuscript, contained in the library of the British Museum, by this Grideville, which bears the title in Norman English of the Pylcgrimages of the Soule, and is identical in plan, structure and language with the work which has long been attributed to the Bedford tinker. Our French contemporary accordingly claims the credit of this remarkable book for France, "although," it says, "France hitherto has shown less appreciation of the original than England has bestowed on the copy." These statements will no doubt astonish the numerous readers of the "Pilgrim's Progress." But all will doubt the possibility of one so pious, so honest, so faithful, "even unto bonds," as old John Bunyan, contradicting the whole course of a life of integrity in so foul a plagiary as this Frenchman charges. We think no one need tremble for the persecuted Baptist.—This is not the first time he has been so charged. Southey in his "Memoir of the Life of Bunyan," particularly mentions anywhere which it was alleged Bunyan had plagiarized the materials for his allegory, and among them mentions the "Voyage of the Wandering Knight," translated from the French of the Chevalier, Jean de Carthenay, and printed during the reign of Elizabeth. Carthenay's work was an imitation of a French poem, composed A. D. 1310, by "Guill de Guilleville, a monk of Chaalis," and entitled the "Pelerin de la Vie Humaine." Southey says:

"There is a vague general resemblance in the subject of this work, and some occasional resemblance in the details, but the coincidences are such as the subject would naturally lead to, and the Pilgrim's Progress might have been exactly what it is, whether Bunyan had ever seen the book or not."

The probability, almost amounting to certainty is, that Guill de Guilleville is by a typographical error, changed into the G. de Grideville, of the French paper, and that the work which this Miss "Catherine Isabella Cart" has found, is the same one mentioned by Southey.

And indeed, we may say nothing more to convince us of Bunyan's authorship of "Pilgrim's Progress," than marked traces in the work of the same mind which produced "The Holy War," which has never been attributed to any one else. Besides this, throughout all the writings of Bunyan, the two books mentioned above, his sermons, and his letters, there is a similarity of tone and style which really stamp them as the productions of one man. We have no fear therefore for the fame of the great allegorist, and shall still claim for the English language John Bunyan's immortal Pilgrim's Progress."—N. Y. Chronicle.

Wonderful Escape.

We are indebted to Mr. J. M. Adams, of North Dundas, for the following account of a remarkable escape. David S. Cornell, formerly of Beverly, and now living in the town of Beauhamois, C. W., was driving a team of horses along the road in a heavy storm, and when passing a patch of woods, he saw with amazement a large tree falling directly on him. Before he could escape the tree fell on the waggon which contained a straw-cutter and pump, smashing the whole in atoms, and causing the horses to run away. But the remarkable part of the story is this: the jerk caused the waggon to stop suddenly, precipitating Mr. Cornell forward, rendering him insensible for a short time. On recovering he found himself lying between the tongue and the only unbroken wheel. He luckily escaped with little more than a bad fright, the effects of which confined him to the bed for two weeks. A more lucky termination we have never heard of.—Brockville Recorder.

AN APPEAL TO THE GIRLS."—The Puget Sound Herald makes the following affecting appeal to the girls in the Eastern States:—

"Of the three thousand voters of Washington territory, it is safe to say that two thousand are desirous of entering the matrimonial state. Give them a chance, and our word for it, they won't make a long courtship. By the time these two thousand are disposed of, we shall have two or three thousand more, judging from the large number of bachelors constantly coming among us. Here is the material to bring our charms to, girls. Don't be bashful, but come right along, all who want good husbands and comfortable homes, in the most beautiful country and the finest climate in the world."

LOVE à la MODE.

Some people talk of love,
As if it were a game;
Others strive with love
And fight love to tame.
Some people talk of love
As if it were a passion.

Because it is the fashion.

Yet all the Wise men,
Have loved with equal zeal.
Some will love for beauty,
And some will love for money,
But I do love to love
Because it is a phrase.

There's true love, there's false love,
And love that lovers pretend;
There's affected love and boarding-house love,
And love that never does end.
There's sighing love and languishing love,
There's sneaking love and [illegible]
There's [illegible] love than honey is,
But I always love to love of love
That ends in matrimony.

To meadow every kind of love
Might be an endless theme.
There's love in different conditions,
Of love in different men.
But I'm not going to write a book
About your common love,
The surest way to gain it is—
To offer her your hand.

One of the conclusions arrived at by the late Reform Convention was to organize a "Constitutional Reform Association," with branches in every County or Riding in the Upper Province. To the delegates to the Convention is intrusted the work of organization. The matter will be taken up immediately in this County, and that the public may fully understand the object of the Association, we give beneath the proposed Constitution:—

2. Resolved,—That the following be the Constitution thereof:—

ARTICLE I.

The Constitutional Reform Association of Upper Canada is established for the purpose of—

1. Procuring for the people of Upper Canada a Legislature and Government which shall have control of all matters of a local or a sectional character.

3. Procuring under an amended Constitution, further and better safe-guards against extravagant public expenditure, and Executive mal-administration.

4. Procuring the election to Parliament of candidates pledged to the foregoing principles.

ARTICLE II.

The Association shall consist of all members of Parliament, and members of the Press, and all other persons, who shall subscribe to this Constitution.

ARTICLE III.

The general affairs of the association shall be managed by an Executive Committee, holding its first meeting in Toronto; of which Committee all members of Parliament subscribing this Constitution, and all presidents of branch associations, shall be members, with such other members of the Association as the Committee may from time to time elect. The said Committee may appoint its own officers, and adopt rules and by-laws, ten being a quorum for that purpose.

ARTICLE IV.

Branch associations shall be organized in each township electoral division, at the most central or convenient town or place, which shall be managed by a President, as many Vice Presidents as there are municipalities in the division, a Secretary, and a Treasurer, and a local committee, of not fewer than five persons.

ARTICLE V.

The members residing in any municipality may, under the Vice-Presidents for that municipality, organize a sub-committee.

ARTICLE VI.

Meetings of the Executive Committee of Branch Associations and sub-committees, shall be held pursuant to adjournment, or at the call of the Chairman, President or Vice-President, of which due notice shall be given.

ARTICLE VII.

Meetings for the election of officers, after the first meeting, shall be held annually at some day (to which day it will be given) in the first week of December of each year.

ARTICLE VIII.

The funds of each British Association shall be subject to the disposal of the officers and local committee thereof, of a majority of them, for any purpose not inconsistent with the objects of this Association.

ARTICLE IX.

The Secretary of each Branch Association shall, as soon as may be after their appointment communicate to the Executive Committee the names of the officers and local committee, and their residence post office address, and such other information, from time to time, as he or the Executive may require.

ARTICLE X.

A Rhode Island Fugitive Slave Girl Sold into Slavery.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Nov. 6, 1859.

A scandalous story has been whispered about from ear to ear, during the past week, respecting an alleged abduction of a colored girl of this city, and her being sold into Slavery at the South. The Newspaper News was the means of the story being made public, and as it has thereby obtained general circulation, I will state the facts of the case. There are two statements, each of which has firm supporters. The girl was born of a slave woman owned by a wealthy family in New Orleans, and when two years of age was brought to this State, and had the privilege of freedom, which she enjoyed until about a year since. Her color and appearance was so near that of a white person that it was impossible to distinguish her from among a company of white children. She attended school, and resided in a family at Newport for some time, when she was brought to this city and lived in a family who were relatives of her mother's owners. She was a regular attendant of the Sabbath School of Grace Church, and much interest was felt in her. She was intelligent and conducted herself with much respectability, and only those who knew her origin could discover that she possessed any negro blood. Within a year she was solicited to return to New-Orleans, where, it is said, alluring prospects were held up to her. It is stated that her mother suddenly called upon her, and induced her to return with her; while another statement is prevalent that she was abducted by two women representing her mother, and she willingly consented, under the plausible representations held out, to not out for New-Orleans. Her mother had previously become free and had sent the girl her daguerreotype, and people who saw these women affirm that one of them bore a striking resemblance to the picture. The girl returned once more to the South, and was sent to the negro trade-yard to be publicly sold as a slave to the highest bidder. The girl herself writes from New-Orleans, under date of Oct. 19:—"The officer took me and locked me up in jail; but the officer took pitty on me, and put me in there for safe keeping, because, if they had carried me to the trader's yard, my mother would not see me again."—Contradictory statements are given as to how the poor girl was disposed of after this period. Her mother, after being free, married a half breed Spaniard, of depraved character; and it is a current statement that the girl was subsequently persuaded, and placed in a position to become as depraved as those about her. The affair is yet enveloped in obscurrity, but efforts are being made to sift it to the bottom. When the story first became public, the people were so enraged that fears were entertained that they would mob those who were supposed to have instigated the abduction of the girl. The parties concerned are of the first families in this city and New-Orleans; but I forbear mentioning names until further, and more decisive developments shall prove that the girl was wrongfully abducted and sold into Southern slavery.

A CURIOUS SKELETON FOUND IN DUMFRIES.

It has been known for many years that there existed in the 8th Concession of Dumfries, about two miles west from the Grand River, a cairn of stones apparently the work of human hands, making, as was generally supposed, the last resting place of some remarkable individual among the red sons of the forest. A few days ago a more minute investigation of this ancient monument was made, by removing the stone of which it was composed. Its form was circular, about five feet in diameter, and on an average 14 inches high. The excavation was likewise circular, three feet in diameter, and two in depth, filled with earth and stones of various sizes.—After removing these, the bones of what appeared to have been a foot were found resting against the southeast side of this curious grave. Following the general direction of the bones, it was evident that the head was laid on the opposite side, namely, the northwest. Here a flat stone, about 20 inches in diameter, lay sloping inward to the centre. It was observed at once that almost every bone was broken; this was attributed at first to the superincumbent weight which pressed upon them, but when the flat stone was removed, a new light was thrown on the subject. The head and bones of the chest lay under it, but completely broken as if they had been pressed between two rollers for that purpose. The face appeared to have been laid downward, the jaws being driven firm into the earth below. The ribs, some sections of the vertebræ and other bones, were so completely broken and confused as to defy all attempts at re-arrangement.—On being dug out, the jaws, which were very strongly formed, presented some most extraordinary features. They were of one solid bone, undivided at the chin, which was wider than that of a man, having six incisors or front teeth, which were formed like the molars of the human species, and behind carrying upward, no molars or grinding teeth ever having existed. This formed the lower part of the mouth. The head having been broken into small pieces, the whole form of the mouth could not be ascertained. Part of one formidable looking tusk was got out in good preservation, of a curved shape, over two inches long and inches in diameter. The upper part of one canine tooth, 1¼ inches long, was also got, having been cut through by a blow from some sharp weapon. Several pieces of the skull measured over a quarter of an inch in thickness, and showed a corrugated of shape that must have given it nearly the form of the human head. In examining the bottom of this strange grave, part of the bones of a dog were found in the vicinity of it, not to much broken as the other part of the skeleton, but in a similar state of decay; they were easily identified by one of the jaws being found complete. A dense mystery hangs on the other exhibition. The want of molar teeth, compared with the form of those which it possessed, would lead us to suppose that it was some monster whose mode of feeding was to tear the flesh from its victim in morsels, and bolt it without mastication. If there is any naturalist in this neighborhood who can throw an additional ray of light on these relics, he will confer a favor, by giving us. An examination of them may be had by enquiring at this office.—Galt Reporter.

MORE INSURRECTION.

Great excitement in Kentucky—Reported discovery of a secret insurrectionary movement.

From the Cincinnati Daily Tribune, Nov. 4.

Considerable excitement, we learn from reliable authority, exists in a portion of Kentucky, relative to the supposed detection of a secret organization having for its object a slave insurrection. The facts, as we have received them, are as follows:

Two anonymous letters were received through the Post-office at Cynthiana, Kentucky, announcing the existence in that locality, of a secret organization, upon a plan similar to that of old Brown's at Harper's Ferry, and having the same object in view. The letters and their contents were made public, and immediately created great excitement throughout Harrison and Bourbon Counties, where it is alleged the organization exists and intended to operate. A public meeting was called at Cynthiana, and was largely attended. Measures were promptly taken to ferret out the members of the organization, and to protect the community against any outbreak that may be attempted among the slaves.

The association is said to consist mostly of negroes led and directed by white men. It is charged that some of the employes of the Covington and Lexington Railroad are leaders in the movement. The anonymous letters declare, that like that of Harper's Ferry, each member of the organization is sworn to secrecy, and it is supposed arrangements for a general outbreak were pretty well matured. A vigilance committee was organized at the meeting of the citizens, and the most precaution is observed throughout the country. Stringent resolutions were passed, and the least movement on the part of the slaves is to be the signal for prompt action. Great consternation and alarm exists throughout the country, and a fully supply of fire-arms have been ordered by the citizens, and a thorough preparation is made for any demonstration that may occur. The people of Kentucky begin to think that this matter of insurrection in their midst is becoming serious, and that it behooves them to be on their guard, lest they are preparing for it.

This matter will be thoroughly investigated, and the guilty parties, whoever they may be, will be brought to justice. It is a dangerous matter to deal with among slaves as they are, as a general thing, easily alarmed at approaching danger of being detected and are prone to expose any evidence that may lead to the arrest of the instigators to save themselves.

It may be that the alarm is without foundation, though the citizens there think differently. If such an organization as set forth in the anonymous letters really exists, it must be fully exposed in a few days.—We shall await further developments.

FROM THE PLAINS!

TROUBLES WITH THE INDIANS ON THE SANTA FE ROUTE.

Correspondence of the St. Louis Republican.

WESTPORT, Mo., Thursday, Nov. 10

Our apprehensions on account of the delayed mails, travel and trade between here and New-Mexico are at length allayed by the safe arrival of a mail train, bringing three over due mails, three passengers and a mass of correspondence. They arrived on the morning of the 9th, in charge of the indefatigable conductor Woodruff, of whose kindness, energy and courage the passengers speak in terms of warmest praise. The gentlemen who came in as passengers are Dr. D. C. DeLeon, Army-Surgeon, from Albuquerque; T. K. McCutchen, of the house of J. & W. R. Bernard & Co., Westport, and W. B. Lifton, Esq., from whom we have gained the following facts: The mail, in charge of J. W. Woodruff, started out from Santa Fe on the 2d of October, accompanied by the above named passengers and a lady [Mrs. Kelly] and two children.

They proceeded on as far as Cold Springs when not meeting any out-going mails, and hearing of difficulties among the Indians, it was considered hazardous to continue, and they determined to return. The male passengers stopped at Fort Union, but the lady and children were taken on back to Santa Fe.

On the 19th, the mail from Independence reached Fort Union, and on the 21st Conductor Woodruff had his passengers again set out for the States, accompanied by an escort of 75 men under the command of Capt. Morris, who guarded them on as far as the crossing of Arkansas River. At this place they expected the special Government escort, but were disappointed. But the conductor and passengers, being all well armed, they concluded to risk that dangerous part of the way, from the Arkansas to the Pawnee Fork, and succeeded in getting through safely.

A military post is now established at the Pawnee Fork, in command of Capt. Stewart, of the Frst Cavalry, with one company only. Their duty will be to escort the mails from Cow Creek to the Arkansas—a distance of one hundred miles—and return. Of course this is but small escort. The season is likely to be inclement; forage and food are scarce; their horses are already broken down; and, under the circumstances, if we get two mails per month during the Winter, we shall be thankful.

The Indians are still hostile, and make attacks whenever they can do so with safety to themselves. The last murder reported is that of Patrick Cahill, of Independence, who went out in the mail coach in which Maj. Donaldson was passenger. It seems that Cahill, seeing some Indians at a distance, went to them to get them to come up to the coach and have a talk with the Major; the Indians refused; a dispute arose; Cahill fired his pistol, the Indians let fly their arrows, and Cahill fell mortally wounded. Seven days after two Indians were seen prowling in the neighborhood of the military post, and were killed by the soldiers. Of course, this will still more exasperate the savages.

The bark SEA, Captain Flanders, of Mattapoisett, left that place on a whaling voyage about a year ago. The captain, and one young convert among the sailors, were the only pious persons on board.—Recent letters report all the crew except one or three as converted. Not so remarkable, but somewhat similar, is the news from one or two of the New Bedford whalers.

GREAT FIRE.

Augusta, Ga. Nov. 17.

The fire at Atlanta lasted from half past 11 o'clock on Wednesday night till 3 o'clock, a. m. It originated in a dry store near Shackleford's question room, and burnt to the floor of the Fulton Bank. The Intelligencer office is in ruins with the two next blocks. The day they attended to Albany street to Holbrook's hat store. Two stables were burnt to death, and another is missing. Loss thought to be $300,000.

New Synagogue in Montreal.

From the N. Y. Jewish Messenger.

The new German and Polish Synagogue in Montreal, Canada East, was temporarily opened for public worship for the new year. The building was commenced in June last, and though not entirely finished was yet sufficiently advanced for occupation during the past Holy days, after which it will be again closed and not reopened till its consecration, which will probably take place in December.

It is interesting to know that this, the first regularly built Synagogue in British North America, which has been erected for the Polish, German, and English ritual, has proved one of the most popular and successful enterprises of the kind ever attempted. Our readers are probably aware that Montreal has possessed for many years a Synagogue originally erected and dedicated to the Portuguese form of worship. The most influential portion of the community having been at the time of its erection, of Portuguese extraction but the constant and steady influx of the English, German, and Polish element, has rendered it long evident that a separate congregation was necessary. The initiative was therefore taken during the Holy-days of last year, by several active and prominent residents of Montreal, and the result was that a handsome subscription list was opened for the building of a new Synagogue. The Messrs' Moss Brothers of Montreal alone subscribed $1,300, and to this liberal and handsome donation the new Synagogue owes its existence. The Trustees of the Congregation have, in consideration of the moral and material aid which these noble Israelites have afforded in furthering this great and holy work, presented the Messrs. Moss Brothers and their respective ladies with seats in the new Synagogue for life, an act which we think is as fitting and graceful on the part of the congregation, as it must be gratifying to the worthy gentlemen who so richly deserved it.

We understand that the Synagogue in question will be one of the handsomest buildings of the kind between New York and Cincinnati. It is built in the Grecian style of architecture, and will be both in its exterior and interior finish, a perfect gem of architectual beauty. During the past Holydays every seat in the synagogue was occupied, and the accommodation for the ladies of the congregation has already proved so limited, that David Moss, Esq., has decided to erect two additional galleries at his own expense before its final completion.

The Rev. Mr. Hoffnung, favorably known for upwards of twenty years in England, has had the pastoral charge of the congregation for the past twelve months, he having offered his services gratuitously until the congregation should be in a position to engage paid officials. On the Day of Atonement Mr. Hoffnung delivered a most eloquent, appropriate and impressive sermon, which highly pleased his congregation. We consider these acts of true piety highly creditable to the rev. gentleman's feelings, and richly deserves to be recorded. We sincerely wish the new congregation every success.

The Great Eastern.

We take the following paragraph from the letter of the Times' Reporter at Holyhead, writing under the date Oct. 27:—

It has been stated repeatedly that it was by the decision of the Board of the Directory that it was announced that the Great Eastern should leave England for America on the 27th inst., and that this sudden change of destination from the United States to Southampton argues great infirmity of purpose on the part of the directory. We believe that no Board resolution was ever passed that she should leave on the 27th. It was merely hoped that she would be able to leave this month, and the idea was given up for the best of all reasons—namely, that when the company's surveyors and arbitrators came to inspect the ship they at once emphatically declared that she was not in a fit state to cross the Atlantic. In the face of such a declaration there was, of course, no alternative but to postpone the sailing sine die. That this decision was a wise one none can doubt, and it is sincerely to be hoped that no divisions in the councils of the directory may arise to set aside a resolution which is not only prudent, but actually necessary. Many may question the propriety of having a body of directors to manage the affairs of a single ship, and nothing but the most perfect unanimity on all matters concerning the welfare of the undertaking will reconcile the public to such administration. As regards the actual departure of the Great Eastern for America it will make very little difference if the directors decided that she start for the United States on this day week, for the whole question as to the date of sailing now rests with the Board of Trade. Until their requirements have been complied with no passenger certificate will be given, and the precautionary measures which they insist on are only likely to be completed at Southampton, and cannot possibly be done in less than two months at the earliest. First hose has yet to be fitted to the auxiliary engines aft, more sails have yet to be bent, spare spars, extra boats, and feed pumps to the engines have all to be completed. The fixing of the wheel and tiller chains must be altered, cast-iron stanchions placed amidships, beneath the iron upper-deck, and some apparatus or another devised for warming the saloons. The cold we heard the vessel during the last few days has been very severe though of course, a mere trifle to what must have been endured if the Great Eastern had started for America this winter. In fact, it is not too much to say that without some means of increasing the temperature in the forecastle and between decks scarcely any officers or men could have been found hardy enough to venture across the Atlantic at this season of the year. American gentlemen best acquainted with the feeling which prevails in the United States with regard to the Great Eastern think that any voyage there now must prove a perfect failure for showing the vessel, while on the other hand they are so confident that if the ship starts to New York, in the spring she must realize between $600,000 and $700,000 clear of all expenses. How far this estimate may or may not be exaggerated we cannot take upon ourselves to say; but there must doubtless be a wide and most important margin between the receipts if taken this winter and those which may be fairly expected next year, but in real truth, as we have said these speculations are quite beside the question, when the plain fact remains that the ship should not leave England till thoroughly completed, which at present she most certainly is not. It is said that the berth chosen for her at Southampton is a perfectly safe one, and it is beyond a doubt that that port offers such facilities for completing the vessel as makes it imperative she should go there at once. A great many rumors are afloat as to a postponement of winter voyages, but the fact is, as yet, nothing definite has been settled. It is just possible that before having England the Great Eastern may visit Glasgow and Kingstown, but beyond such likely possible contingencies nothing whatever is known or thought of.

THE LATE GALE.

Up to the close of Lloyd's on Saturday afternoon, intelligence was still coming in of casualties and losses during the late great storm. Its equal for violence and terrible consequences, has not been experienced for the last twenty years; and the boisterous weather of Friday night led to some apprehension that there would be a renewal of the gale. By a return made up to Friday evening of the results of this gale, we find the following:—Vessels totally wrecked, 96; vessels stranded and other casualties, 530—total 626. Probable loss of life, including the Royal Charter, 800. Many of the losses will fall heavily upon Lloyds, and the various marine insurance offices, but the bulk, coasters, were principally insured in clubs. Another shocking accident has happened on the Welsh coast at Fishguard. The wreck of a large passenger ship, apparently 1,000 tons, bottom upwards, was seen under the rocks at Aberbach. It has since been ascertained that the unfortunate ship was the Charles Holmes, 880 tons burthen, commanded by Captain Rowdley, which only left Liverpool for Mobile on the 26th, the morning preceding the storm; and from the spot where the wreck was found, it would be impossible for any person on board to survive, the whole of the coast being a range of precipitous rocks. At present it has not been ascertained whether she had any passengers; it is thought she had. The crew however would number many souls.—Although an American built ship she sailed from Liverpool, and her loss will prove very heavy. Among other affecting incidents of the storm, one is mentioned by a gentleman who returned from the neighbourhood on Wednesday night. During that afternoon two little boys, one 11 and the other only 9 years of age, lashed to a piece of plank or a small bit of timber, were washed ashore at Conwny, both still alive. It appeared that they had thus been launched on the stormy waves by their father, from a little vessel, on its proving unseaworthy.—Our informant adds that their father also reached the shore in safety, and that the little boys must have made a perilous voyage of at least sixty miles on their bit of plank.

GERRIT SMITH IN THE INSANE ASYLUM.

The announcement of the insanity of Gerrit Smith was made in our last issue. He was committed to the Utica Asylum, in this State, on Monday, Nov. 6. The Albany Atlas and Argus, of Nov. 11, has the following:—

A gentleman who saw and conversed with Gerrit Smith, shortly after the affair at Harper's Ferry, told us that he was insane—not merely excited by fear, and agitated by the emotions which his complicity in the affair might produce, but mentally deranged. His eye was wild, and his appearance haggard, and his motions spasmodic and uncertain, but unceasingly restless.

He was in constant fear of being arrested and carried to Virginia—and suspected his friends of an intention to betray him into the hands of justice. When the cruel electioneering hoax was circulated that Gov. Wise had issued a requisition upon Gov. Morgan for him as a fugitive from justice, he seems to have become so frantic that his friends saw no other hope than to send him to an asylum.

We make an extract from a private letter upon this subject, which gives some particulars of this sad end of a well-meant but misdirected career, fatal in its consequences alike to him and to all with whom he involved in his fanaticism:—

UTICA, Nov. 8, 1859.

MY DEAR SIR,—Gerrit Smith was brought to our Asylum yesterday, and is quite deranged, intellectually as well as morally; and he is also feeble physically. He refused to take an anodyne, alleging that they only wanted to put him to sleep for the purpose of boxing him up and taking him to Virginia. When informed that he must take it, voluntarily or by compulsion, he opened the door and screamed (into the hall) "I protest!" He then took it. I deem his madness a sign of the times. He is a victim to the excitement which he helped to make general, and which, in various degrees, is now prevading all the Free States. It is much allied to the excitement against witches that prevailed at Salem and other parts of New-England, and the time will come when our descendants will look back at it as we look back on the doings in Salem. I am not sure but that the Harper's Ferry outbreak will intensify the excitement.

CONDITION OF THE BANKS.

The banks are again extending their loans, and at a time when their specie is being reduced. The truth is the banks are in a tight place. If they extend the discount line, they reduce the specie in vault, and cause a reduction in the rate of interest. If they retain the discount line in order to retain their specie, they cannot strike regular dividends. These difficulties have given them much trouble. They are between two fires. The stockholders call for dividends, and the public complain when they attempt to expand. The present week they appear to have broken loose from their keepers, have increased their line nearly $2,000,000 and lost $800,000 in specie.

The election is engrossing the attention of the people stopping business for the week. Who are to be the fortunate parties is difficult to tell—but if we believe what the politicians tell us, the present election is one of more than usual importance. We suppose it but reference to the politicians of the day, who persuade themselves into the belief that the destiny of the country hangs upon a thread.

TWENTY-SIX MISSOURI NEGROES ARRIVED IN CANADA.—The negro exodus from Missouri continues. There is a stream of negro emigration to the South, and another to the North, bearing away our slaves at a rate that will cause destroy the last vestige of the institution, and leave us entirely aggrieved. On Friday there arrived in Detroit, Michigan, bound for Canada, twenty-six negroes on the way from Missouri, having been carried through by the agents of the Underground Railroad. The leader in the movement is said to be a well-known for his exploits in Kansas, and his connection with certain exciting events (Doy's trial?) in Missouri.—The slaves are discoyed from the border counties and even from the interior, by agents, conducted into Kansas and Nebraska, and conveyed thence to Iowa, Illinois and Michigan to Canada.—St. Louis Neuts

IS pleasantly situated at the head of ST. PAUL STREET, amongst the largest wholesale houses in the city. It has (with the gentlemen generally, and especially with the Trade Merchants of both Provinces) become so great a favorite, that it is now acknowledged to be THE Business Hotel of Montreal. To meet the extensive patronage, during the last year in the business of the house, the proprietor has built a large addition. The Dining Rooms have been enlarged and made lofty and airy, and there have been introduced in the new wing, a grand Quarter of well-ventilated sleeping rooms, and the House throughout has been refitted, and now combines many improvements and elegancies hitherto unknown to its guests. The whole of the beds have, on a great expense, been furnished with NEW SPRING MATTRASSES. The Proprietor expects that by continuing the personal management of the concern, the ALBION, to say the least of it, will continue to be, as it ever is, the best Hotel and a full Hotel in Canada.

Peterboro', Nov. 17th 1859.

ADDRESS

TO THE ELECTORS OF THE TOWN OF PETERBORO'.

GENTLEMEN:

Having received, at the hands of a respectable number of your body, a requisition, calling upon me to be a candidate for the office of Mayor, for next year, and having accepted their nomination, I desire to bring briefly before you the grounds upon which I invite your support. You are aware that the financial position of the Town is not in the healthy state its friends would desire for it, and there are many who trace the disadvantages under which it labors to the want of prudence and economy in the gentlemen who have lately controlled the action of the Council. The first step I shall take, if you give me your confidence, shall be to ascertain as near as can be done, the actual state of the Town accounts, and after striking balances, commence on from a new date to keep your accounts, after such a manner that no difficulty may again arise to prevent the true state of every separate account being at any time ascertained. The confusion which has for some time prevailed, may have given opportunities for a freer use of the Town funds than you would sanction, and should at once be removed. The next step to be taken, is to use the strictest economy in the application of your means, to appoint no more officers than the work to be done requires; to have the town improvements, printing, and every other necessary work done by tender and contract, so as to secure to every inhabitant the privilege of rendering his own castor, and to do away with the objectionable system of petty favoritism which always may be found when jobs are to be done under the superintendence of the Council. I shall, also, make it my business to see every means to realize as speedily as possible all the outstanding debts due to the town, with the view of relieving in a measure our financial distress. Such a course being one of the first acts a prudent man would pursue to wind his affairs over an unpromising aspect.

These being the main points that now agitate the minds of the rate-payers, I do not deem it necessary at this time to trouble you with the various other matters which at the nomination and on other occasions I shall have great pleasure in discussing with you.

I remain,
gentlemen,
your obed't
humble serv't

SARTLING BUT TRUE!

SURVIVE OR PERISH.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.

The history of this great remedy is the most wonderful medical revelation that the world has ever known. It is not a history written by one man, or even derived from the experiences of one nation, but consists of a compilation of testimonials from the sick of every country—a record, the like of which has never been adduced in favour of any discovery or invention since time began.

BILIOUS DISORDERS.

In whatever form disease attacks the liver, it is repelled—each exterminated by this searching, painless and irresistible curative.

Let the sick whom the faculty have abandoned resort with confidence to this antibilious agent, and a restoration to health and activity will be the unvarying result.

DYSPEPSIA.

The great scourge of this continent yields quickly to a course of these antiseptic Pills and the digestive organs are restored to their proper tone; no matter in what hideous shape this hydra of disease exhibits itself, this searching and renewing remedy disperses it from the patient's system.

GENERAL DEBILITY AND WEAKNESS.

From whatever cause, however or severe, and all other signs of a diseased liver, vanish under the eradicating influence of this all powerful anti-septic and detergent remedy.

THEY HAVE COME

That good substantial stock of

Boots and Shoes,

direct from Montreal, and selected with the greatest care by an EXPERIENCED HAND.

Also a fresh supply of

GROCERIES,

all of which will be sold as cheap as the cheapest in Town.

☞ Remember the place—Next door to R. Dennistoun's Law Office.

J. T. STENSON.

Peterboro', October 20, 1850. 43

F. G. CALLENDER,

Surgical and Mechanical Dentist,

KNOWN to the inhabitants of Peterborough and vicinity, for the past 12 years, intimates that he will continue to visit Peterboro', on the first Monday in each month, for the week, prepared to perform all operations of the profession, in defiance of competition as to neatness and durability, (except Allens teeth with platina, it being a substance not then used by the profession.) He is also prepared to insert Teeth on Vulcanized Rubber, a much approved new style, being free from taste, much cheaper than Gold, and is said to be equal in neatness and durability, and much more agreeable in the mouth, being less weighty.

Public attention is invited to the above. Rooms over Mr. Clarkson's Store.

Peterboro', 9th Dec., 1850. 49

ALBION HOTEL,
MONTREAL.
L. W. DECKER, Proprietor.
IS pleasantly situated at the head of ST. PAUL STREET, amongst the largest wholesale houses in the city. It has (with business men generally, and especially with the best Mechants of both Provinces) become so great a favorite, that it is now acknowledged to be THE Business Hotel of Montreal. To meet the extensive increase, during the last year in the business of the house, the proprietor has built a large addition. The Dining Room has been extended and made more commodious; there have been completed in the new wing, a great number of well-ventilated sleeping rooms, and the House throughout has been refitted, and now contains many improvements and conveniences hitherto unknown to its guests. The whole of the beds have, as a great expense, been furnished with NEW SPRING MATTRASSES. The Proprietor expects that by continuing his personal management of the concern, THE ALBION to say the least of it, will continue to be, as it now is, the best Dollar and a half Hotel in Canada.

ADVERTISE! ADVERTISE!!
In The Peterborough Examiner.

Original Poetry.

For the Examiner.

War versus Liberty.

Whence come the wars which desolate the earth,
Which give to pestilence and famine birth,
Spread desolation world-wide! and woe
Springs from this source with never-ceasing flow;
Do king's wage war to guard their people's good,
And bring them happiness with hostile blood?
Do monarch's brave the dangers of the field
To aid their subject's cause and them to shield?
No! but for glory; thirsting for a name,
Still they pursue the glittering bubble—fame.
Or avaricious lusts possess the breast;
The curse of sceptres, and of crowns the past;
For these they slaughter myriads of mankind,
And give to passion thus their body, mind,
For these, oppress their subjects, whom they hold,
Born to obedience by Fate's firm resolve,
Drive thousands of them onward to their death,
Wading through blood to catch Fame's bauble breath.

When Corsica sent forth her mighty son,
To sport with sceptres which his arms had won,
O'er Europe's plains as Death's dread angel flew,
And fierce the rough war trumpet loudly blew;
He traced his steps in blood from side to side,
And snatched at power borne on the crimson tide:
While death and ruin followed in his train,
And famine brooded o'er the wasted plain.
Such is the bless of war; but when will men
Learn to be wise, and follow wisdom's ken;
They have no interest in the wars they wage,
While hatching woe, and for the coming age;
And while they fight for power to crush their right,
The haughty Monarch spurns him from his sight,
Esteems them tools for which 'tis weak to feel,
And raises high his fame upon their ruined weal.

Hail! sacred Liberty! the gift of Heaven,
Which to the favored sons of earth is given,
To beam upon their lot, their blessings bless,
To cheer 'mid labor, 'mid their toils refresh;
For void of thee, their very bliss a curse;
The bane of Freedom, slavery's haggard nurse.
But neath thy sacred influence, spring forth
Man's neutral energies and moral worth;
Neath thy bright ray, each virtue of the soul,
Breaks forth, where vice had reigned without control;
Knowledge presides as nurse o'er every part,
And while it forms gives feeling to the heart;
Thou blessest human life in every lot,
The Prince's palace and the peasant's cot,
Science and art then lend their generous aid,
To make thy blessings every land pervade,
Each useful scheme that blesses human life,
Springs up and spreads, secure from fields of strife;
Mild peace pervades a nation 'neath thy sway,
And happiness beams forth in an eternal day.
Oh! sacred Genius! bless my country still,
Protect it every hour from every ill;
Shine on each native wild with heavenly beam!
Illumine each mountain and gild o'er each stream;
Though bare its rocks, land of my fathers shield,
As in the days of old, in battle field;
As in the days of old thou warm'dst the heart
Of Presbyterian fathers;—now thy fire impart,
Still teach its sons to guard their country's laws,
And fire their breast in Freedom's holy cause.

Ashburnham, Nov., 1859.

Single or Double!

Joshua and Jane Wheelwright, brother and sister, each in the neighborhood of thirty-five, lived together in a house on Harrison Avenue. I need not mention the number; you will recognise the house at once from its being of brick, and three stories in height The brother is in business—has an office on one of the wharves—and his sister keeps house for him.

"Why don't he get married?"

A very natural question, my reader. In answer I may say that he professes to think a single life far preferable in point of happiness. His sister echoes his opinions.—She, too, considers a state of single blessedness rightly named. To be convinced of this, you need only listen to the conversation which took place between them one evening.

"How comfortable it is to-night," says Joshua, drawing on his slippers, and placing his feet on the fender before the glowing grate, "with no noisy children to disturb you."

"Precisely. I ought to feel thankful that I am not that domestic slave, a wife," continued Jane, taking up her knitting work.

"You wouldn't be so independent. Yes, a single life is the best. Perhaps it is 'sour grapes' though; I don't know as anybody would have me if I wished to marry?"

"There's plenty would be glad of the chance," said Jane emphatically.

"Eh! do you think so really?" said Joshua.

"Of course they would. Why you don't think seriously of it, do you?"

"O, no indeed; only I wouldn't like to have it said that I remained unmarried, because I was obliged to."

"I've a great mind to tell you something, Joshua."

Joshua looked at his sister in surprise.

"I think there's a woman that's in love with you."

"You don't really think so."

"Yes, I do."

Joshua turned red, and then a smile came over his face—a pleased look of bashful incredulity.

"Now you're joking, Jane—I am sure you are."

"She the same as confessed it to me," said Jane.

"She did! Why didn't you tell me, then," asked the brother, with a little excitement in his manner.

"Because I knew you were principled against marriage, and very properly thought a single life was the most favorable for happiness."

"O, yes," said Joshua, a little mortified. "Still I should like to know who it is. I don't object to being liked you know."

"Well it was the widow Hawkins."

"Was it?" said Joshua with animation. "She's a very interesting woman, Jane, Don't you think so?"

"O, yes; she'll do very well."

"Rather good looking; don't you think she is?"

"Yes" said Jane indifferently.

"Jane I've got something to tell you," said Joshua, after a pause.

"What is it?"

"I was once sounded by some one as to what his chance would be in case he proposed to you."

"You don't say so, Joshua!" exclaimed Jane, in a flutter. "What did you tell him?"

"That you had often preferred a single life."

Jane looked amazed.

"And this discouraged him, so that he that it would not be worth while to plead his suit. I only tell you now, because you may be pleased to know that some one thought of you."

"How long ago was this, Joshua?" queried Jane, dropping several stitches in her knitting.

"How long? Really I can't tell. When was it we had this carpet new?"

"Ten years last October."

"Well, that's the time; I remember one by the other."

"And who——I believe you haven't told me who the person was."

"It was Mr. Grant, our bookeeper."

"It was! And the poor man has kept unmarried for my sake?"

"Yes, I expect so. He seemed a good deal down at my answer. But of course, I did't want to give him false encouragment.

"No," said Jane, absently. "But, Joshua, I believe I'll go to bed; I have had considerable to do to-day, and feel tired."

"Good-night, Jane."

"Good night, Joshua."

So the widow Hawkins likes me," thought Joshua to himself. "I wonder I never suspected it! And perhaps she has been making herself unhappy about me. I really shouldn't want to feel that I had broken up a woman's happiness. After all, perhaps it wouldn't be so great a sacrifice to be married. As a man grows old, be somehow feels the need of a wife more. There is Jane—does pretty well, to be sure; she keeps me comfortable, keeps my shirt supplied with buttons, and so on; but after all—

Joshua plunged into a fit of medition.—What the nature of it was may be guessed from its termination:

"At any rate, I guess I'll call on the widow to-morrow. It wont do no harm; in fact, it will only be neighborly, and a proper attention, considering her good opinion of me."

Meanwhile, Jane was passing through a similar train of reflection in the chamber to which she had retired.

"I wonder," she murmured, "I never suspected how Mr. Grant felt towards me! It's very wrong, I am sure, in Joshua, to have concealed it from me so long. I ought to have known. I am sure I always had a high opinion of Mr. Grant—a very high opinion. There are not many such men so honorable and considerate as he. And he isn't bad looking, either; he has a fine mature look, though no doubt his disappointment has worn upon him. To think that I should have caused it too! I am sure Joshua was very much to blame for not having told me before. Ten years ago too!"

And Jane began to speculate on how affairs would have changed if she had accepted Mr. Grant at that time.

"I suppose," she thought with a little accent of reproach, "that Joshua was afraid of loosing his housekeeper. But he ought to have told me—he certainly ought."

The next afternoon, it so chanced that Mr. Grant had occasion to call at the house on some commission from his employer.—This was not by any means unusual; he had often called before. But it was with a new feeling that Jane met him. A faint flush came to her cheek, and she said so urgently "Mr. Grant, do come in," that he couldn't resist the temptation.

"How time slips, away, Mr. Grant," continued Jane, with volubility. "I was thinking, last night, that it was just ten years since this carpet was put down."

"Ten years," repeated Mr. Grant, thoughtfully.

"Yes, ten years. I am afraid I have changed a good deal in that time," said Jane demurely.

Mr. Grant looked up. He could not see the ravages of time.

"I don't think you look an hour older." said he, a little warmly.

"Don't you, Mr. Grant? I am so glad though I know you are mistaken! But I like to seem unchanged in the eyes of those whom I esteem so highly."

"Do you esteem me highly?" asked Mr. Grant, abruptly.

"Very highly. I always did," said Jane "I hope I have always given you reason to think so?"

"Yes," said Mr. Grant, nervously.

He looked at her for a moment in silence.

"Couldn't you do a little more than esteem me highly?"

"What do you——I don't understand," said Jane, her heart beating considerably faster than usual.

"I mean, can you so far overcome your scruples to marriage as to accept me?" said the bookkeeper. "There, I've said it, although your brother told me that you were resolved never to marry."

"I have changed my mind!" murmured Jane.

My dear reader, I must really leave you out of the room. If Mr. Grant was to press his lips to the cheek of her whom he had ten years loved, it is none of your business or mine. What subsequently took place we have no right to know, but don't understand to doubt, do we?—Joshua was invited to breakfast, the next to tea, to dinner.

"I suppose Joshua will be dreadfully provoked," the thought, "and will keep out the few blushing Spinsterhoods left in Peterborough for many years. But then, of course I don't want to trifle with Mr Grant's happiness. Poor man! I have already too much to answer for in that way.

So Jane awaited not without trepidation her brother's steps. He did not come home to tea, not a little to her surprise. "However he is detained by business I suppose, she thought to herself, and she was a little nervous, though he could not be safe to seem unhappy.

"Here are your slippers, Joshua," she said. "Why, good gracious, you are trying to put them on over your boots!"

"Am I?" said he, a little foolishly. "I was thinking of something else."

"Joshua."

"Well, Jane."

"Mr. Grant was here this afternoon."

"Yes, I sent him up."

"He—well, you will be astonished—he asked me if I would give up my scruples against matrimony, and become his wife."

"And you," said Joshua, eagerly—

"I thought if he was so very much in earnest, I ought not to make him unhappy by a refusal."

"Bravo!" exclaimed Joshua, with sudden animation. "That's just what I thought about Mrs. Hawkins."

"And you proposed to her?" exclaimed Jane."

"Yes, and was accepted. After all, marriage isn't so bad, especially if you can make somebody else happy."

And so the brother and sister who had so long opposed matrimony, are to be married together.

Scotland.

During the past ten days the North of Scotland has been visited by storms of snow, wind and rain, of such severity as is rarely experienced at this season of the year. The severity of the weather may in some measure be calculated from the fact that two men in their prime, who had occasion to be travelling in the night-time perished in the storm—the one in Banffshire, the other in Aberdeenshire. On Wednesday, the 26th ult., the snow changed into a perfect hurricane of rain and wind, and accompanied, we regret to say with four loss of life. The following lamentable occurrence took place on Wednesday, the 26th, near Aberdeen:—Mr. Coupar, farmer, Strathorn, Logie Elphinstone, was returning from a sale with a neighboring farmer, Mr. Booth. On their way they were joined by Mr. Fawns, cattle-dealer, Brechin; and the three friends rode together in Mr. Coupar's gig. Between the turnpike road and the farm of Strathorn they had to ford the Ury, which in its usual state is only a pleasant stream, some seven or eight yards in width. The tremendous rain throughout the day, however, had swollen it to a perfect torrent. The hour being about eight at night, darkness prevented the state of the stream being seen, and unfortunately danger had not been suspected before entering it. The gig had not advanced far in the water, however, before Mr. Couper, perceiving their position, got alarmed and exclaimed that they would all be drowned. Mr. Fawns, who at this moment sat with Mr. Booth on his knee, called out to the other two gentlemen to hold on by the gig, if possible. He had scarcely spoken when the gig was swept down the current and overturned. Mr. Fawns, though encumbered with a waterproof overcoat, by great exertions managed to reach the farther bank of the river by swiming; but the others had disappeared at once, and were never seen again alive. The Banffshire Jour al states that the early severe snow storm of last week was succeeded in the north of Scotland by floods of the most extraordinary character. Our contemporary says:—"Wednesday and Thursday were days of which it may be said, with considerable certainty, there have been few parallels within the last half century; and Friday night and part of Saturday the storm was scarcely less severe. More rain may have fallen, and the rivers may have risen higher in the August floods of 1829, but as a tempest of wind and rain and stormy seas combined, the past week is scarcely equalled." The Journal records numerous casualties which have occurred. Considerable damage has been done to the newly opened Strathisla Railway. A vessel named the 'Venture,' of Inverness, on her way from Sunderland to Macduff, on Saturday narrowly escaped being stranded. The Deveron rose very high, and flooded not a few of the low-situated houses in Banff on Wednesday night. In one house, it is said, two fish were caught which had swam in at the back window.—On the same night the burn of Turriff was immensely swollen, the water rising higher than the flood of 1829. Two stone bridges were broken down, and a number of wooden ones swept away. The railway bridge on the Banff and Turriff Extension, which spans the water of Turriff, yielded to the strength of the flood, the south pier being entirely carried away. In Glass and Cabrach much injury has been done to grain and stock by rain and snow. In the latter place several shepherds were digging part of their flocks out below wreaths from 12 to 14 feet deep, but were at last obliged to discontinue operations until the tempest would abate. Several boats have been imperilled, and have been destroyed at Cullen, and two inmates in Portsoy alone were blown down on Friday night, the inmates of one of them having only left it ten minutes before the roof fell in. Two boats belonging to Portgordon were driven ashore in the course of Friday night a complete wreck. Bridges and corn stacks have been swept away in Aberdeen. The north fork of the Ugie at Tillichmolt was swollen nearly two feet higher than in the flood of August 1829.—The old bridge of Cruttenauld, under which the 165th unfortunate Lord-Provost hid from his pursuers, was completely broken in view in the wild waste of roaring waters. The bridge at the Green of Rattray has been destroyed. A number of fishing boats have been wrecked at Whitehills. Two men have perished in the sea; a woman has died in consequence of the violence of the storm on Cairnbulg, and two sad boys have been lost in Cullen, one of whom was drowned while endeavoring to save the life of his companion, who had fallen into the water while they were playing on the ice. Many other disasters have occurred, but these are the most serious which have come to our knowledge."

The Warning Voice of Lord Brougham.

From the London Times.

Lord Brougham upon England and France is about as promising a subject as one could expect on a bleak autumn day. Nobody knows so well the dark and the light side of each picture as the man who once seriously tried to combine both allegiances, and who appears to be as much at home in one capital, one society, one province, as the other. It is fortunate for us that we have these eccentric beings, who, as the comets were once supposed to do, revolve round two centres, and link two systems. Had not his Lordship himself alluded at Edinburgh to his various career, we should not have recalled ever so ingenuously circumstances which have been connected on in different ways; but we were never more serious than we had in Lord Brougham an utmost providential medium between English and French ideas. It cannot be denied that we want such a medium, for it is the tendency of nations, as of individuals, to look only to one side of the question; to see all things in their own light, and to judge all by their own rule. The Englishman of old could hardly be got to think the Frenchman anything but a vain, conceited fellow, with a strangely exaggerated estimate of his powers, led away by delusion, without a notion of true liberty, and a positive nuisance to mankind, but for the happy circumstances that he has neither practical abilities, nor the moral courage, nor the physical strength, of the Englishman. Inwardly we all congratulated Europe on the possession of so steady and vigilant a sentinel as she possessed in England. What France thought of England has been so excellently expressed in almost every French paper, and so confidently, though politely implied in the language and demeanor of every French gentleman, that it would be almost superfluous to repeat it here. It may, however, be summed up in the opinion that only by the merest mischance had England ever gained the most trifling advantage over France, either in war, or diplomacy, or in the higher arts and sciences. Had Caliban, through some brutality, or some unlucky fault of a spell, become master of the island, and Prospero, Miranda, and Ariel, all been driven into a corner, that would have expressed very nearly to the French mind the moral and politically position of the two countries.—A Frenchwoman and an Englishwoman had much the same relative opinions of one another. The former was, of course, always simpering, conceited, self-conscious, superficial, and a good deal more: the latter always stupid, vulgar, tawdry, clumsy, ill-dressed ungraceful, with nothing but a tolerably strong frame, and a robust figure and rude sense, to recommend her. Such was the mutual expression of two races that lived in sight of one another, that had many elements in common, and though many of these prejudices are wearing away, still the national differences upon which they are founded must be real and important. They are not to be slurred over. It is vain to expect that Englishmen and Frenchmen will ever act or think alike. It is idle to say that a Frenchman ought to take what we may happen to think the most sensible course. He will not. It is not his nature. So Lord Brougham recognizes the difference, and adapts his advice to the two nations accordingly.

France is too fair, England too prosperous, he says, not to excite the envy of the Great Tempter. To the one he presents himself as one of her own Victories. She is there an angel with wings to span the world, just alighting from the skies, and offering to her favored people the laurel of triumph, the crown of dominion, or the palm of glory. France cannot but listen to the call which harmonizes with all her traditions, and is already written a thousand times on her monuments, and in every art, of painting, sculpture and architecture.—She is already devoted from her birth "to all the glories" of her race. Victory surmounts her columns; Victory crowns her heroes; Victory weeps at their grave, and conveys their spirit to the skies. Glory is all in all to France. She seems to have forsaken all else, as if to concentrate her powers on this one pursuit. Her aristocracy has become an obsolete remnant and rural superstition; her land suffers endless sub-division; her manufactures are protected in vain; her commerce always flags; her colonies are gone; her very liberties are comprehended in the fact that she once freely elected her Emperor; what, then, is left but glory? To cross the Alps, to spend the blood of myriads, and create a confusion which all the earth may never set right, is but a cheap price for one wreath of the sacred tree. So were horses, so were Emperors adorned; so lay they on their lofty pyres or in their sepulchral chambers; so sit they in Elysium to receive the homage of kindred souls! All else perishes; glory survives. Reason itself cannot wrest immortality from the hero as long as the world rolls on its axis. So persuades the great Tempter, and France will always lend a willing ear to the strain that has so often been her only solace for innumerable sorrows. But let France bethink herself. Glory is not dear to her because it has cost her everything. Is she still resolved to pay everything for it? To do so she has always done it, indeed, one way to read the lessons of history; but, if it be right, then whatever, and everything worth a freeman's regard consists in wilful ruin, and an obstinacy of error

But, spreading his sparky wings and crowning the Channel, the Great Tempter lights on this our motley isle—native to freedom, crossed by prosperity, consecrated to compromise, surrounded by the Channel, to the best of guard. Hence, he spits the high pretender, he spreads no forged wings, and offers no gilded crown. Regarding his feats and harkening his words, he could give the advantage on the prospect which he has held the Chinese, Cossacks, Russians, Austrians, Prussians, Spaniards, Italians, Americans, Germans, physical development, good sanitary institutions, material in-

The Journal records numerous casualties which have occurred. Considerable damage has been done to the newly opened Strathisla Railway. A vessel named the 'Venture,' of Inverness, on her way from Sunderland to Macduff, on Saturday narrowly escaped being stranded. The Deveron rose very high, and flooded not a few of the low-situated houses in Banff on Wednesday night. In one house, it is said, two fish were caught which had swam in at the back window.—On the same night the burn of Turriff was immensely swollen, the water rising higher than the flood of 1829. Two stone bridges were broken down, and a number of wooden ones swept away. The railway bridge on the Banff and Turriff Extension, which spans the water of Turriff, yielded to the strength of the flood, the south pier being entirely carried away. In Glass and Cabrach much injury has been done to grain and stock by rain and snow. In the latter place several shepherds were digging part of their flocks out below wreaths from 12 to 14 feet deep, but were at last obliged to discontinue operations until the tempest would abate. Several boats have been imperilled, and have been destroyed at Cullen, and two inmates in Portsoy alone were blown down on Friday night, the inmates of one of them having only left it ten minutes before the roof fell in. Two boats belonging to Portgordon were driven ashore in the course of Friday night a complete wreck. Bridges and corn stacks have been swept away in Aberdeen. The north fork of the Ugie at Tillichmolt was swollen nearly two feet higher than in the flood of August 1829.—The old bridge of Cruttenauld, under which the 165th unfortunate Lord-Provost hid from his pursuers, was completely broken in view in the wild waste of roaring waters. The bridge at the Green of Rattray has been destroyed. A number of fishing boats have been wrecked at Whitehills. Two men have perished in the sea; a woman has died in consequence of the violence of the storm on Cairnb

Town Finances.

The Town Finances are in a deplorable state at present. Many persons having honest bills against the Town are compelled to turn away from the Treasurer's office with rueful countenances; that gentleman being compelled for lack of funds to refuse them their wish. Several parties holding notes against the town have given notice that they will not grant a renewal. But this is not all; the town is in arrears to a considerable amount for interest on money borrowed from the Municipal Loan Fund, and the Treasurer of the Town has received notice from head quarters that on and after the first of Dec. (to-day) no monies shall be paid out by him, for any purpose whatsoever, until the said interest is paid up in full. This is a pretty state of things. When the Treasurer may have enough to discharge the Government debt is a question we cannot answer; but he is tied hand and foot now until it is paid, and poor men must starve while the Town is owing them; nor can we see any desire on the part of the Council to remedy the evil. It seems as if the gentlemen who compose the present Council were bent on putting their successors in office into the greatest difficulty possible; the most utter indifference to provide for expenditures being manifested. But let us look for a moment at the cause of this state of things: The very money which we are now compelled to pay to the government is interest on a loan to complete the branch of the Port Hope road, and the notes which are now due were given for money raised to pay in full our stock in the branch. Every one knows Mr. Fowler agreed to pay to the Town 6 per cent. interest on our stock, but every one may not know that he has never paid one cent of that interest. This is the secret of our difficulties. In answer to the demand of the Town for the sum due he has either evaded the issue or been silent altogether, giving no satisfaction whatever. But the worst of it is yet to come: had Mr. Fowler been unable to pay the back interest, or had the road not yielded a premium we would be compelled to keep silent in this instance; but no such thing. We are informed on the best authority that the road has not only paid expenses, but has enabled Mr. Fowler to satisfy several large claims against him in certain quarters, contracted before he had anything to do with the Town, and we are to suffer in this way merely because a cunning railroad contractor like the lessee of the branch refuses to pay his honest debts! We should be sorry indeed to see the Branch closed, but rather than the ratepayers be swindled out of what is justly theirs, to fill the pockets of Fowler we would see the road closed for ever. If the present Council will take no action in the matter, we hope men will be found to take their places at the approaching municipal election, who will follow up every man who is indebted to the Town, whether it is on railroad interest, ground rent or taxes.

Woman and Child Drowned.—A boy about 5 years of age, son of Joseph Doe, a Frenchman, living in the neighborhood of Snyder's Mills, while amusing himself on a boom-stick floating in the Otonabee River, accidentally fell into the water. The mother of the child who was near at hand, and perceiving the accident, rushed out to its assistance, but lost her balance and fell into the river also. Before aid could be given by parties on the bank, both mother and child had sunk to rise no more. The body of the woman was found about a half an hour after the accident, by her husband, who we understand has become almost insane from the effects of his sudden bereavement. The unfortunate woman has left behind her a small family; one child being but a few months old.

Serious Accident.—Mr. Clegg, the miller at present in possession of the Grist Mill, known as "Peplow's Mill," on Water Street, met with a serious accident on Saturday forenoon last. He was engaged in feeding the hopper for one of the stones which was grinding peas, when, it is supposed from the peas being wet, the machinery became clogged, causing the stone to break to pieces, sending fragments in every direction. Mr. Clegg received a severe blow on the right leg, and another on the forehead. He was immediately carried to his residence where his wounds were dressed by Drs. McKeown and Brown. It was at first thought the limb would require to be amputated, but we are happy to learn that there is yet hope of its being saved. A son of Mr. Clegg who was also in the mill at the time of the accident, received some injuries, but not of a serious nature.

Stereoscopes.—These delightful instruments are we notice becoming very popular. Hitherto they have been so expensive as to place it out of the question to purchase one for family use; now they are offered for sale at low prices. Nothing can afford so much cheap entertainment to a family as a stereoscope with a well selected set of views. Our old friend Murray advertises in another column that he has an extensive stock of them for sale, and we know that any person ordering from him will be satisfied.

St. Andrew's Day.

Yesterday being St. Andrew's Day, preparations were made for its due celebration by the St. Andrew's Society. In the evening an excellent discourse was delivered in the Baptist Chapel by Rev. Mr. Douglas. Although many were present, yet they by no means represented the Scotch element of the Town, in point of numbers. This may have been owing perhaps, to the very limited notice, or to the early hour; people being unable to leave their business in time to attend; however, the discourse was an able one and deserved a larger audience.

Later in the evening, a Dinner, under the auspices of the St. Andrew's Society, was given in Scott's Assembly Rooms. It may be unhesitatingly set down as the most successful affair of the kind ever given in Peterboro'. About 120 persons were present. James Hall, and A. Sawers, Esqrs. presided. The Room was beautifully decorated with evergreens, paintings, mottos, &c., and hung round with the Shepherd, Gordon, and Rob Roy tartans, and was brilliantly lighted up with lamps. Altogether, it was an imposing scene, and reflected credit on the taste of those gentlemen who had the duty to perform. To speak of the Dinner would occupy more space than we can afford this morning, albeit Frank fully sustained his well-known reputation.

After dinner the usual loyal toasts were drank with great enthusiasm; then came the toasts of the Vice-President,—"The Day and all who honor it." "Our Native Land." "Our Adopted Country." "The Mayor and Corporation of Peterboro'." After which the Volunteer toasts were given and responded to as follows:—

Scottish Heroes—D. Sutherland, A. Miller.

Bards of Scotland—Geo. Coupar, Dr. Holywell.

Agricultural Interests—W. A. Scott, Jas Jack.

Our Sister Municipality—C. Cameron, D. Sutherland.

Wreck of the "Indian."

We had only gone to press on Thursday last when the melancholy news reached us of the loss of the Steamship Indian, belonging to the Canadian line, and one of the finest ocean steamers afloat. But one feeling prevaded the whole community when the news spread, and that was a lament for what was considered a national calamity.—The accounts were only meagre, and very conflicting. The first dispatch which reached us stated that all the passengers were safe, and that only three of the crew were drowned. The next dispatch told a very different story: that out of the whole passengers and crew only 24 were saved. Later and more authentic dispatches, however, give what may be supposed a correct account of the unfortunate wreck. It appears she struck on a ledge rock, near Marie Joseph, N. B., while at a speed of 8 knots per hour, on the morning of the 21st inst., when she tore off her bottom and filled almost instantly. The Captain was deceived by the soundings, and supposed he was off Cape Sable. She had on board 8 cabin, and 30 steerage passengers and a crew of 60 men. When she struck a rush was made by the steerage passengers for the boats, and sunk numbers 1 and 2 drowning the engineers, several of the crew and passengers, and two women and children; the remainder of the passengers were picked up by a schooner and conveyed to Halifax. The mails have been saved but the cargo will prove a total loss. The cabin passengers saved were Mrs. Meldram, Mr. and Mrs. Patterson, (of Peterboro',) Mr. and Mrs. Street, Mrs. Elliot. The names of the drowned are, William J. Moses, wife and two children, Mrs. Eickman and child, Alex. Dean, Jas. Dixon, Thos. Channerhouse, and Wm. Johnston.

Death of ex-Chief Justice, Sir J.B. Macaulay, C. B.—The demise of this lamented gentleman took place quite suddenly at his residence in Toronto, on Saturday last the 26th inst. Up to within an hour of his death, he appeared to be in his usual health. Hon. Mr. Macaulay was first appointed Judge in 1829; in December, 1849, he was appointed Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, from which position he retired in February, 1856.—Since then, until very recently, the Ex-Chief Justice was one of the Commissioners engaged in the revision of the statutes.—Deceased was in his 67th year; he was a native of Scotland, and came to this country with his father, Dr. Macaulay, in the beginning of the present century.

The Counties' Council has been in session since Tuesday morning. The principal business transacted is the arranging of matters connected with the separation of the Town from the Counties.

TOWN COUNCIL.

Monday, Nov. 28th, 1859.

The Council met. Absent, Mr. Eastland.

A letter from the Provincial Secretary, announcing the intelligence that owing to the Municipality being in arrears for Municipal Loan Fund interest, His Excellency the Governor in Council, cannot give his sanction to the By-law submitted to him for raising £2000, was read.

Sundry accounts were presented and referred to Committee on Finance and Assessment.

A report from the Town Treasurer in reference to the state of the Town Finances was read, received and adopted.

A report from the Finance Committee, recommending the payment of sundry accounts, was presented.

Moved by Mr. White, and seconded by Mr. Morrow, that it be an instruction to the Reeves of this Municipality in the event of the Counties Council, being disposed to settle the amount to be hereafter paid by the Town of Peterborough, as its proportion of the expenses of the administration of justice and the use of the jail without the appointment of arbitrators, to offer the sum of $500 as such proportion, its being distinctly understood that in the event of this offer being refused, and arbitration being appointed, this Council will not in any way consider itself bound by this offer—Carried

Moved by Mr. Conger, seconded by Mr. Henthorn, that the Collector be authorized to receive checks issued on behalf of this Council for taxes.—Carried.

Moved and seconded, that the sum due from Mr. W. A. Stott or so much thereof as may be necessary to cover the amount expended by him upon the bridge across the Otonabee River on the north side of the Town be allowed to remain in his hands until the Council are prepared to furnish the sum appropriated for that work; and that the commissioners, Messrs. Scott, Hopkins and Conger, be requested to furnish this Council with a full and particular statement of the amount now expended and also the present state of the work.—Carried.

Moved by Mr. White, seconded by Mr. Fowlis, that Mr. Atkins be informed in answer to his petition that this Council have steadily refused to make any abatement in the price of License, and that therefore his request cannot be granted.—Carried.

The yeas and nays being called for are as follows:—Yeas, Messrs. White, Fowlis, Bradfield, Read, Morrow, and Burnham. Nays, Messrs. Henthorn, Teole, Kennedy, and Hogan.

A resolution granting Mr. Benjamin Reynolds a beer license, fee until March next, was passed.

The Council then adjourned.

UNIVERSITY DEMOLITION.

The Newburgh Index thus concludes an article against the movement of Dr. Ryerson and Mr. Nelles:—

"The demands made by Dr. Ryerson and Mr Nelles are grossly selfish and dishonest. To divide the University College fund amongst a score of petty schools and colleges, to gratify a petty feeling of jealousy would prove not only an entering wedge to the principle upon which our school system is established, and its final overthrow; but the youth of our country would be left without a respectable and efficient college or university in which they could obtain a cheap and efficient education. We are happy to know, however, that the agitation throughout Upper Canada is extremely unpopular among the laity of the Methodists themselves, and not a secular newspaper published in the Province, so far as we have seen, that is not decidedly opposed to it."

We have much pleasure in noticing the advertisement of Mr. S. M. Aitkens in to-day's paper, who, it will be observed, has opened an establishment in our rising Town as a first rate Grocery Store, in connection with his business in Port Hope. Mr. A. understands how to succeed in business—he is a liberal advertiser.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

Dear Sir,—As I anticipated, our friend of the Review, is not satisfied that I made out my case in proving the charge of selfishness on the part of his clients, and yet he adopts the course I pointed out, as most likely to evade that charge. My "platitudes" and "voluntaryism" and what not has had the effect to lead him to begin the matter right, which if his friends had done they might have worked their way and accomplished their end. My reasons for opposing the measure from the first may be found in the fact of the total absence of anything like argument to show that the University fund would be better to be divided among the denominations, or that it was an institution not needed, or something of the sort. But, all at once, the last Conference seems to have found out, for the first time, that they had an interest in the University fund, and they adopt the resolution at once that they should withdraw that interest for the benefit of their own College. Their efforts since then have been confined to abuse and bluster. Toronto University was a "godless" institution, and we must obtain our "just rights" out of it for Victoria. Now I like the manner your cotemporary is going to discuss the subject, and I shall be most happy to break a lance with him in a "friendly spirit," and if he convinces me I have been wrong in opposing the scheme he advocates, I shall publicly acknowledge that error, and turn round and advocate what I formerly opposed. My sense of justice and fair play will, I trust, always lead me to act in a controversy only in consistence with these. The Review has not time or inclination to follow me, but I intend following it, and shall watch his special pleading on behalf of his clients.

I am, Mr. Editor,
Yours truly,
J. E.

In Leghorn, on the 7th ult., a remarkable scene took place. For the first time the Jews of that city offered up a prayer for a Christian Prince, and invoked the blessing of Heaven upon Victor Emmanuel, King of Sardinia. The prayer was recited by Signor Roberto Finaro. At the first word the 2,000 Jews present, with the exception of a few old men, rose to their feet, and remained standing until the close of the prayer, to which they all responded with an overwhelming "Amen."

Portland, Nov. 29.

The Bohemian left Liverpool at 10 o'clock, on the morning of the 16th, and arrived at Portland at 8.30 p. m. on the 29th.

THE CONGRESS.

No announcement is yet made regarding the approaching Congress.

The London Times says, in a leader, "We shall require to know in plain, frank and undiplomatic language what it is which the Emperor of France requires us to act in our character as member of the great council of Europe. An English minister must have something more definite, and much more consistent upon the subject of the Duchies than statements in Count Walewski's Circular, before he would be justified in committing this country to take any part in a Congress for the settlement of Italy.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The splendid new screw three-decker of 121 guns was launched at Portsmouth on the 12th, in the presence of the Queen and Royal Family. She is called Victoria, and was christened by Princess Frederick William of Prussia.

The announcement that Dr. Smethurst was to be brought up under a writ of habeas corpus, and charged with bigamy, had been fulfilled. The preliminary proceedings at the police Court resulted in the doctor being committed for trial on that charge.

Earl De Grey is dead; aged 78. He held high offices in Sir R. Peel's Administration.

The London Times, in an editorial on the relations of England and France, entertains no doubt that a feeling of hostility to England, more bitter than has existed in France since 1815, now prevails, and it charges the French Government with directly encouraging this feeling.

The English Government have promulgated its plan for creating the proposed reserve force of naval volunteers.

The enrolment of the 30,000 men authorized by Parliament commences on the 1st January. Attractive inducements are offered to volunteers.

Captain McClintock had read before the Royal Geographical Society a very interesting narrative of his recent voyage to the Arctic regions.

A serious mutiny had prevailed on board the ship of the line, Princess Royal at Portsmouth. Over 100 men were taken prisoners and placed in irons.

The demand for money continued active at former rates. Applications at the Bank exceeded the average.

The Stock Market had been dull and heavy, with slight decline in consols.

LATEST.

London, Wednesday.

The Post denounces the article in yesterday's Times as "a wicked and wanton alarm. It is specially designed to put the blood of the nation up. The whole article is a wicked and wanton alarm." The Post adds, "we may some day find ourselves at war with France, but not in consequence of a sudden and unexpected invasion."

FRANCE.

The Le Pays says an extraordinary credit of 50,000,000 francs is to be devoted to the Chinese expedition.

The Moniteur publishes a report of Admiral Rigault de Genouilly on the fight of the 5th of Sept., with the Cochin Chinese, in which the enemy suffered severe loss.—The report says, "We have put the enemy to flight and have destroyed their forts and artillery. Our loss amounts to about 10 killed and 40 wounded."

Marseilles newspapers state, that instructions from the French Government were received at Alexandria, on the 27th Oct., to prevent any fact that would interfere with the privileges of the Suez Canal Company's works.

The Paris Journal La Presse had given a crushing reply to the anti-English pamphlet of Jourdain's, the editor of the Siecle.

An improvement had taken place in the Paris corn market. Wheat and flour were both dearer, and at many provincial markets prices had also advanced.

SPAIN.

Nothing of moment has transpired relative to Spain and Morocco.

The Spanish Government has chartered five steamers at Genoa, belonging to the Transatlantic Company. The Spaniards charge the English with supplying the Moors with weapons and instructing them in their use. Active preparations for war prevailed in Spain.

A telegraph between Ceuta and Algesiras was about to be laid.

AUSTRIA.

An Imperial autograph letter has been addressed to the Minister of Finance, expressing a desire of the Emperor to make good the defect in the budget of 1860 to 1861. In order to carry out the desire of the Emperor, a committee will be appointed whose work is to be terminated at the end of March, and the result submitted to the Council of the Empire. The numbee of members of the Council of the Empire will be temporarily increased for the discussion of this subject.

GERMANY.

In the sitting of the Federal Diet on the 12th, the affair of the Constitution of Hesse Cassel was referred to the committee.

RUSSIA.

Letters from Berlin say that Prince Gortschakoff has addressed a letter to the Russian diplomatic agents abroad relative to the Breslau interview. It appears certain that either Prussia or Russia will support the protection of the Italian Confederation.

STORM.

On Saturday, the 19th instant, we were visited by one of the most severe storms we have had in a long time. A strong northeast wind, driving before it the keenest, sharpest rain and sleet that it was ever our fortune to face. Boyd's wharf suffered severely. About 200 feet, as we should judge, is swept away. The store house is uninjured. Some damage was also done to the steam saw mill, the gangway for drawing up logs out of the water was carried off and the boom for confining the logs gave way under the pressure. The large two-masted scow Tecumseth had a narrow escape from total wreck. Not being able to make the river in the dark, she was anchored outside the bar when the storm arose.—She dragged her anchors for some distance, and went on shore between the Sydenham and the Pottawatamie, but happily got off again. She had on board over 60,000 feet of lumber, and is now unloading at Spencer's wharf.—Owen Sound Times.

The screw steam yacht Fox, recently returned from the Franklin expedition, was sold at Lloyd's on the 10th, after a spirited competition, at £3,325.

It is stated that 29 gambling houses are established and doing a flourishing trade in one little circuit of the business portion of Chicago.

Details of the Disaster to the North Star.

From the New York Herald.

We sailed from New York, Oct. 29, 1853, on the United States steamship North Star, bound for Aspinwall. In an hour after leaving port we landed to and took aboard the officers and men ordered to Panama to relieve others of the Saratoga. Our passengers then numbered eight hundred and seventy-five all told.

We had a smooth sea until the morning of the 21st, when rough weather set in, and for a day or so nearly all were in a state of torpid misery. Seasickness, however, the great leveller, could not affect the variety of character stowed away within the compass of our ship, I think it might be said, without dissembling, that the American character was represented completely, as it consisted of every form between the most polished gentleman and scholar and the vilest vagabond that ever traversed the continent.

We were carried to the eastward by the Gulf stream. Having passed Cape Hatteras we were in a smooth sea. The weather was warm, and time passing pleasantly. In the evening we had music, and many of the passengers joyously engaged in the dance; the evening's amusement closed merrily with the "Virginia Reel." The passengers retired, many of them confidently expecting to make Aspinwall as soon, if not sooner, than the "opposition." The captain and the crew also, elated with the prospect, are putting forth their best endeavors to come out ahead.

At a quarter after eleven, p. m., the rain was so thick that we had to for one hour and twenty-five minutes. I spoke to the captain after the rain was over, and we were under headway—say at three o'clock a. m. He reported that we had passed the islands feared, and that the sea was now clear. Captain Wright was present and that also appeared to be his opinion. At 4:40, a. m., we struck one of the French Keys, called Pinnas island, about three-fourth of a mile from the beach. It is accounted for by the ship having drifted to the leeward, in consequence of running slow and laying to. It was the captain's opinion, though, that we had passed the island ten or fifteen miles. He had been on the look out all night, and had just gone to the pantry for refreshment, but leaving the second mate on duty. The latter left his post to give orders relative to washing decks, and while gone the ship struck.

She had hardly touched when the passengers were all out on deck, terribly excited, and were surprised that the island was not seen in time to avoid danger—it being twilight. It was soon ascertained that she must be lighted of her passengers and coal. The small boats were manned by the sailors of the Saranac, and the process of removing passengers commenced. The women and children were taken first, then the men, canvas mattresses, &c.—Some of the men went to work building tents, while others went in search of water, curiosities, &c. At first all seemed pleased to be once more on terra firma again, altho' on an island uninhabited, without vegetation or water. It appears to have been formed by volcanic eruptions and the coral insect. The passengers were all landed by 11 a. m., and the most of them not having had breakfast, and but little water, began to feel their dependent condition.

A majority, indeed, of all those on the island acted like famished wolves, and it looked as if hunger and thirst had divested them of all restraints and courtesy to each other so pleasing in well regulated societies.

Our tents were strewed along the beach in fair order, presenting the appearance of a menagerie with numerous side-shows. It was amusing to see the eagerness of our inhabitants at meal times to get their respective places in rank.

To-day, the 28th, he reports all hands at work, including crew of the Saranac, in throwing coal overboard; Captain Wright sent to Fortune Island to procure assistance; Captain Jones working like a tiger, with hopes that the ship would be gotten off.

The 27th, 28th, 29th, and 30th at the ship the order was hearing coal, and every day at high tide an effort was made to heave her off the reef, the Saranac's officers and men working with all the strength they possessed, deservedly winning for themselves the hearty thanks and admiration of the passengers. During this time they moved the ship some twenty feet, and each success was announced to the islanders by the hearty cheers of the crew, and responded to by them in the same appreciative manner.

At the island there were incidents occurring nearly every day to disturb the monotony, which I will take up in order and dispose of in as brief a manner as possible. On the 27th a hospital had to be erected to receive the sick. There were about thirty cases on hand—none dangerously ill, however—the most of them being the result of wandering around the island in the hot sun, and fear lest they would die of thirst or starvation.

All the coal, except enough to run us into Kingston, Jamaica, being thrown overboard, a desperate attempt was made to heave off the ship. The blocks and tackling proved inadequate, and again there was a failure. The schooner that Capt. Wright and Lieut. Braine sent for our assistance was at anchor near us, but proved to be nothing more than a wrecker after salvage. Captain Jones tried to treat with them for assistance in some shape, but their prices were so exhorbitant that nothing could be concluded. As an instance of their desire to extort, they asked the captain fifteen hundred dollars for blocks and tackle, not worth fifty dollars in the States.

Monday, the 31st, all are anxious, as the fate of the ship, or at least the time of our delay, is pending. The tide and swell of the sea favorable. Everything in readiness for high tide. It came—they succeeded. At half past ten she is floating in deep water. The passengers met on the beach, and gave three cheers for the North Star, three cheers for Captain Jones, and three cheers for the officers and men of the Saranac.

At two o'clock boats were sent ashore for passengers. Our wreckers came in good play now; that is, the small ones manned by the negroes. The captain employs them to assist in moving passengers. All seems eager to get to the ship, and it was with much difficulty we were enabled to give the women and children the preference.

The ship got under weigh, heading for Fortune Island, to receive Captain Wright, and men, as also to lay in a supply of water. We arrived at Frank Town, received the captain, and laid to between there and the French Wells until morning. On the 4th, at twelve, we cast anchor in Kingston harbor, and all rushed for the shore. When I returned to the boat, the native women—about one hundred—were engaged in carrying coal on board in baskets on their heads. We got off on the 4th at 2 o'clock, and to-day—the 8th—by noon we expect to cast anchor in the Aspinwall harbor.

We are now at Aspinwall (2 p. m.) after an absence from New York of 19 days, all in good health.

THE SAFETY OF STEAMSHIPS.

The following remarks by the New York Times, on the "safety" of steamers in the American service gives one little insight into the number and nature of dangers to which passengers are exposed. We confess that the bare recital of these probabilities is enough to damp the ardour of any average number of intending voyageurs. The suspense caused by the absence of the North Star seems to have awakened the attention of some of the New York papers to the matter; and we hope that since this has been done the subject will not be allowed to drop until something sensible and satisfactory shall have been done by the authorities of "Gotham," or by any one and every one whose business, interest or pleasure requires them to give the subject some consideration.

We take the broad ground that the general run of ocean ships, when they are compared with such ships as commerce might not only provide, but afford, are simply slaughter houses. The are systematically provided with every appliance of danger. They are habitually curtailed of every appointment of safety. They lack adaption to the means of preservation which nature has provided. They scientifically embody the elements of destruction. They render the passage of nature's own wide ocean highway more precarious and full of danger than the sealing of mountain embankments and the transit of rotten bridges on the narrow and crooked railways on land.

Here is a wooden steamship. Furnace funnels running through pitch-pine cases and floors; reckless and ignorant firemen; hundreds of uncovered lamps swinging by the side of tinder partitions, and combustible clothing and materials of all varieties; smoking-rooms, lamp-rooms, oil-rooms, paint rooms, and, often enough, powder-rooms, of dry pine, under the charge of raw and cheap servants and the tender mercies of thoughtless passengers; pumps barely large enough to fulfil the inspector's conditions, out of reach, nobody knows where—seldom used—possibly out of order; fire plugs in unknown localities, and passengers, if not crew, habitually ignorant of how and where to get at them; green hands shipped from the dock the day of sailing—insufficient in number and under a discipline which is a mere farce compared with the old fashioned regime and the necessities of the case—the very food for panic and disorder; not half boats enough to carry the ship's company in case of abandonment—lowering apparatus proverbially liable to accident—entire absence of discipline in their management, and, too often, the boats leaky, frail, and without spars and provisions. Here is a beautiful prospect for the times! But this is only the first letter in the catalogue of possible and probable disasters. Machinery liable to the same strain—heavy in this ship and light in that—of all possible materials and proportions, the right pattern not followed, if known. Machinery broken down—no spare parts, and no seperate means of propulsion—ship falls into the trough of the sea, waves board her, break in her skylights and upper works, and fill her with water—billows hammer and strain her light timbers till she leaks like a seive—gets before the wind, and broaches to, because she has not canvass enough to render her manageable. Question him who has lain in a Vanderbilt ship for two days in the trough of the sea, without a spare spar to replace a broken yard, without a spare rag to replace a split sail, and without a plank to splice the broken spar—unless some of the paddle-wheel floats were sawn for the purpose. And what are the chances in case of collision with ice, with other vessels and with shoals and rocks? Thank Heaven! bulkheads are now put into most ships—but how are they put in? Let the public go on board and see. In many cases they do not come up to the water line, in others they are full of doors and holes, and in very few cases are they real pillars of strength and safety. And when ships are supplied with only one reliable means of propulsion, and that, the engine, rather expected to break down than to hold fast, the light spars of paddle ships being of no independent account whatever, what is to prevent their being helplessly driven upon lee shores and drifted about at the mercy of the elements? These are not imaginary cases. There is plenty of precedent for them and many more.

ENGLAND, SPAIN, AND MOROCCO.

The official organ of the British Government, the Gazette, contains this week a correspondence between Lord John Russel, Mr. Buchanan, the British Minister at Madrid, and the Spanish Minister, Senor Collantes, respecting the objects for which Spain is undertaking the war against Morocco. Our Foreign Minister tells Mr. Buchanan that, "if the Spanish Government only seek redress for wrongs, and vindication of their honour, Her Majesty's Government will not interpose any obstacle to their obtaining such reparation; but if the outrage of the wild Moorish tribes are to be made a ground for conquest, and especially on the coast, Her Majesty's Government are bound to look to the security of the fortress of Gibraltar. His lordship instructed Mr. Buchanan to ask for an explanation. "If," says Lord John Russell, "the Spanish troops should, in the course of hostilities, occupy Tangier, that occupation must be temporary, and not extend beyond the ratification of a treaty of peace between Spain and Morocco;" and he adds, "an occupation till an indemnity is paid might become a permanent occupation, and such permanent occupation Her Majesty's Government would consider inconsistent with the safety of Gibraltar.' Accordingly, Mr. Buchanan waited upon Senior Collantes, read to him the dispatch which had been forwarded from London, and received an oral as well as a written assurance which satisfied the wishes of the British Foreign Secretary. Spain, he declares, will not hold Tangier after a declaration of peace with Morocco has been effected, and Spain has no intention of occupying any part of the Morocco coast which would in the least endanger the navigation of the Straits of Gibraltar. Some time ago, it was rumoured that Lord Palmerston looked with great distrust upon the possible results of the impending conflict between the Moors and Spain, and that he was doing his utmost to prevent hostilities. But the satisfactory assurances which have been so promptly tendered by the Madrid authorities have calmed these apprehensions, for the war is not to be one of conquest but chastisement. "The Balance of Power," is a phrase constantly in the mouths of diplomatists; hitherto it has had special reference to the affairs of Europe, but it seems now to be extended to Africa. Nevertheless, the jealousy with which we regard our possession of Gibraltar will be generally regarded by Englishmen as arraying on the side of a wise discretion, and these explanatory interchanges before the war may prevent a good deal of embarrassment after it.

The first cargo of new block pine arrived at New York on Friday—a couple earlier than last year.

SHOOTING AFFAIR!!

A YOUNG LADY ATTEMPTS TO KILL HER ALLEGED TRADUCER!

From the Cleveland Leader, Nov. 18.

Yesterday afternoon two ineffectual attempts were made to shoot Mr. Richard Moore, a compositor in the Plaindealer office, by Miss Sarah Hubbard, who has, until recently, been also a compositor in the same office. That she did not do this without most outrageous provocation, the following statement will show.

Miss Hubbard has been for a year or two working in several of the printing offices in the city, in every one of which she showed herself to be not only a skilful operator, but her conduct has been such as to ensure her the respect and esteem of all who knew her. Although engaged in a vocation in which she had had few or no female companions, there has never been reason for a whisper of slander or a word of disrespect to be offered against her.

For two or three months until quite recently she worked in the Plaindealer office and while there became acquainted with Moore, a brother typo. The acquaintance continued pleasantly until a few weeks since when she heard of disrespectful and ungentlemanly remarks which he had made about her, and informed him of the fact.—Since that time, he has avoided her entirely but has busily circulated the most outrageously false and slanderous stories respecting her, such as, if true, would shut her out of the pale of all respectable society. She first got knowledge of this conduct of his on Saturday evening last. On Monday morning she consulted a lawyer on the matter, and earnestly endeavoured to arrange a meeting with Moore to explain his conduct, and either substantiate his charges or make suitable retraction. During all of this however, he has carefully kept himself out of the way, even staying away from his meals to avoid meeting with the lawyer and another friend of hers.

Finding no available way of obtaining any fair dealing from him, Miss Hubbard grew desperate at the false position she was placed in before the word by his base slanders, and resolved to obtain satisfaction in a summary manner. We should have stated that as a result of his misrepresentations she had lost her situation in the Plaindealer office.

Yesterday she obtained a pistol and watched at the City Hotel for his passing. She met him in front of door about 3, and, facing him, demanded that he take back his accusations. Not doing this, she fired at him, but missed her aim. He wrenched the pistol from her, and left her. She procured another pistol, and waited in the hall of his boarding house, on Champlain street, for him to come up from his supper in the basement. When he appeared, she fired at him again, but again without effect, and again he got the pistol from her, with the able assistance of a companion. She broke away from them and left the house.

It is to be regretted that the girl who was so brave in the defence of her honor, was not more successful in her object, but we much mistake if her cowardly calumniator finds this town a safe vineyard to labor in. It remains to be seen whether he will be able to find further employment in the printing offices in town.

Miss Hubbard is an orphan, and came to this town homeless, penniless, and friendless, but with a noble independence she has scorned no honourable calling, and has by her exemplary life won friends who will take pride in protecting her from further ruffianism.

Capture and Suicide of Rouse, the Burglar!

The Syracuse Courier gives a long account of Wm. H. Rouse, one of the most successful burglars that has ever operated in the United States. After a pursuit of two years, he was taken at Hudson, N.Y., on Saturday the 5th instant, and about ten o'clock that night he jumped from a Hudson river steamer, and was drowned.—Jewelry stores were the principal objects of the depredations of Rouse and his two associates, named Card, brothers; but if a store containing silk goods fell in their way they did not spare it. They often made lifts to the value of $2000. In October, 1857 they cleared a store ner, N. Y. —Her statement proved strictly correct in every particular. The officers proceeded to Hudson, and obtained permission to occupy the front room of a house directly opposite Rouse's house. In the afternoon, Mrs. Rouse came out and walked down street. Officer Lowell shortly followed after her. Next Rouse himself came out of his house, and officer James followed him down the same street. Rouse now had an officer in front and rear without knowing it. James managed to signalize Lowell, who was ahead, and he turned back, and the two officers so graduated their paces that Lowell met Rouse just as James came up behind. Lowell reached his hand out to him, saying, "How do you do sir. I think I have seen you somewhere" Taking hold of Lowell's hand, he replied, "I think you must be mistaken." Lowell held on to Rouse's hand to give a long shake, when officer James coming up, spoke out saying, "How do you do, Mr. Revenge! I believe that was what you called yourself in a letter to me." At this sudden announcement, Rouse jerked his hand away from Lowell and made a pass for his side pocket. James seized Rouse's arm from behind, and Lowell instantly got the handcuffs on him. Rouse's house was fitted up elegantly, and the officers found a trunk full of stolen silks, and concealed under the floor a quantity of silver ware, stolen from a store at Auburn. They also found a large quantity of burglar's tools. They at once started with their prisoner, but while crossing the ferry at Albany he jumped overboard and was drowned. The last words he spoke were —"Well, I am not so badly off as 'Old Brown.' He will be hung."

EMIGRATION OF COLOURED LABOURERS FROM CANADA TO JAMAICA.

The correspondent of the New York Times, writing from Jamaica respecting the opening of the House there, says that His Excellency dwelt on the subject of immigration for some time, and, to the great gratification of the planters and others having an interest in the permanent welfare of the colony, announced that a supply of East India coolies may be looked for in the early months of the succeeding year; and that a number of Chinese labourers, with their wives and families, have been engaged. He also stated that, with the sanction of Her Majesty's Government and the concurrence of the Government of Canada, an agency has been established in that province to assist in the removal of a limited number of the colored population, should they prove desirous of resorting to Jamaica. By advices since received, I have heard that a number of Canadians have agreed to emigrate to this island, and that they may shortly be expected.

SMOKING AND CANCER OF THE LIP.

M. Bouisson, of Montpelier, according to the Medical Times, has recently stated that the great increase of the affection is due to the practice of smoking: and the late M. Roux attributed also to this the fact of his having met with a larger proportion of cancerous affections of the lips during the latter than during the former half of his prolonged surgical career. M. Fleury, of Clermont, is, however, of a different opinion; for, deploring equally with M. Bouisson, the pernicious practice of smoking, he doubts whether cancerous affection of the lip is one of its effects.—Between 1845 and 1855 he has operated upon 86 patients, 71 being men, and 15 women, not one of these being less than 43 years of age.—They were all of the peasant class, chiefly from among the mountains of Puy-de-Dome and the vicinity where smoking is wholly unpracticed. It is a remarkable fact that the inhabitants of the surrounding plains, and of the towns where smoking prevails much more, are almost completely free from the affection.—Medical Times.

AMERICAN EQUALITY.

The Hotel du Louvre has been recently troubled by an American exhibition, which reminds us that Monsieur the Minister of Justice is not the only person a little behind his time in this great city of boulevards. It would appear that, not very many days ago, two gentlemen of colour took up their quarters in the great hotel, where luggage is distributed by machinery, and where there is fitting accomodation for the Russian Prince, and the most commercial traveller—if, indeed, commercial travelling and modesty were ever discovered in company. Little did these coloured gentlemen anticipate the reception that was in store for them They had been accustomed to travel in England, and had begun to feel that they were not as very inferior after all to a cowhiding Yankee. They had become bold enough to stand erect before the white man and to sit and eat in his august presence. They entered the gorgeous salle a manger, therefore, of the Hotel du Louvre without fear, and took their places at the table d'hote with all the ease in the world. They were prepared to eat of the same filet aux truffes and to enjoy the same supreme which were to invigorate and gratify the very whitest man or woman at the table. But they had counted without their countrymen of the West. They were free to eat with enslaved Frenchmen, but not with the enlightened Republicans of the stars and stripe. The waiters were presently seen to be in violent discussion with a group of thin and sallow men, who were "guessing" and "calculating," and "reckoning," vehemently. These waiters were informed that the yellow gentleman in question guessed they were not going to sit at the table with niggers; that these same gentlemen calculated the landlord would have to turn the fellows out; and these gentlemen reckoned, moreover, that they themselves would kick the vermin out neck and crop, should the landlord prove that he did not know his business. The landlord or head of the hotel was introduced. This gentleman very properly declined to expel his selected guests; whereupon enlightened Republicans of the West actually took the law in their own hands, and kicked the "niggers" out of the hotel. And nobody had the courage to take the niggers' part.—Athenæum.

PEACEABLE ARREST OF A CANADIAN MURDERER.—Officer Van Stan arrested yesterday on Irishman named John Jones working at Kellogg & Co.'s foundry, for shooting the clothes of a fellow-workman. Upon being arrested the officer noticed that he bore a striking resemblance to the description of a man who committed a murder in Whitby, C. W., in the early part of the summer, and for whom a reward of $500 was offered. The man's name was John Riley. Upon closer inspection, he is found to answer the description exactly in every particular, and which caused he has little doubt but that he is the man. He admitted having left Whitby and other parts of Canada [illegible] States.

THE CONSUMPTION OF SPIRITS IN SCOTLAND.

Mr. D. M'Laren writes from Edinburgh to the Times, quoting statistics from a recent Parliamentary return, maintaining his former statement that, mainly in consequence of the Forbes Mackenzie Act, "during the four years ending May, 1858, in place of the alleged increase in the quantity of spirits consumed in Scotland, there was a decrease of 6,465,702 gallons as compared with the quantity consumed during the preceding four years under the operation of the old law. Mr. M'Laren continues:—"During this period the population of Scotland must have increased according to the ratio of the last census, at the rate of 1½ per cent. per annum, or 5 per cent in all; and if no change had taken place in the drinking habits of the people the quantity of spirits consumed must likewise have increased five per cent; but in place of this there has been a positive decrease of 22½ per cent., making, with the comparative decrease of five per cent. in the average consumption for each person in Scotland. In England the increase during the last four years was 7,225,935 gallons. In England the population must have increased at the rate of 1½ per cent per annum, according to the ratio of the last census, or six per cent during the four years; but the increased consumption exceeds 12½ per cent., so that the average consumption for each person in England has increased by 6½ per sent. during the last four years, although the Scotch consumption has decreased 27½ per cent during the same period." Mr. M'Laren then combats the statement that the decreased consumption was caused by the increased duty, and that, in fact, the people in Scotland expended more money or whiskey during the last four years than in the preceding period, by statistics which go to show that there was no increased expenditure, but on the whole a small saving of £29,873.

ANOTHER SICKLES AND KEY TRAGEDY.

From the Sarnia Observer.

A disgraceful affair of a somewhat similar character to the above mentioned, occurred at Port Huron, on Monday last,—the parties being respectively a Dr. Freund, and the wife of a person named Fred. McKee, master of a small schooner belonging to that place. It appears McKee had for some time past been doubtful of his wife's fidelity and had adopted means for concealing him in the house, in order to satisfy himself on that point. He accordingly gave his wife to understand that he intended to go to Detroit on Sunday last, and left home apparently with that view, but afterwards returned and secreted himself in the house, unknown to her. Accordingly on the forenoon of Monday, Freund called at McKee's residence, as is supposed with a view of having criminal intercourse with his wife, and McKee, from his hiding place, receiving evidence of the guilt of the parties, made an attack on Freund with a revolver, firing two shots therewith, and afterwards striking him severely on the head with a billet of wood. Although desperately wounded, Freund was not killed, the shots having taken effect in the leg of this unfortunate victim of lust. He was carried to his own residence, where he lingered on until the evening of Wednesday, when death ensued. McKee gave himself up to the authorities immediately after he had committed the act, who took bail for his appearance, and he was thus left at large. Freund, it is said, claimed that he had gone to McKee's house on professional business, as a medical man, and for no criminal purpose, maintaining his innocence of all criminal intent up to the time of his death. McKee, since the death of his victim, has decamped, and this is looked upon by some as an evidence that there may be truth in Freund's statement. It is moreover affirmed that McKee was previously well aware of the guilt of his wife, whose character for some time past has been considered bad; and consequently, that he acted in a most unjustifiable manner, even if Freund's visit was for a criminal purpose; and much more so, if, as Freund alleged, he went there with no unlawful object in view. The affair has created a great sensation in Port Huron, and affords additional evidence, if that were necessary, that "the way to the transgressor is hard."

Garibaldi's Musket Fund.

It is stated that nothing would be more gratifying to the retrograde party in Austria and Italy than the news of the aggressive movement by Garibaldi, as it would offer the first chance for Austrian intervention.

The Florence correspondent of the Times writes: "Everything that Garibaldi takes in hand is sure to thrive. The subscription opened by him for the purchase—not of 1,000, not of 100,000, but of 1,000,000 of muskets, is filling fast, beyond his most sanguine expectations. His success, is indeed, so rapid that he has found himself under the necessity of appointing two deputies for the management of the fund.—Here is his proclamation to that effect published in the Modena Gazette the day before yesterday.

"It was my good fortune to utter one word which alluded to a matter of supreme necessity for Italy, and found, as it would not fail to do, an echo in the hearts of all my countrymen. I asked for arms, and in every spot of our peninsula, and of many other civilized nations, there arose a noble emulation to answer my call, to further the defence of a cause, than which history cannot point out another more righteous or loftier. This noble competition in lending a hand to the cause of patriotism and civilization by no means surprised me, because I have been for many years convinced that the number of minds trained to brave, patriotic, and liberal sentiments is by far greater than the oppressors are willing to believe. Yet so rapid and so splendid was the result of my proposal, that I find myself unprepared for the difficult management of an enterprise which turns out as vast as it is important and sacred. In order, therefore, to provide that this spontaneous aid to our cause should be followed up by a well organized and active administration, I decided it expedient to entrust the direction of the enterprise to Dr. Enrico Besana, of Milan, and Guiseppe Finzi, of Mantua, whose names are well known, for their patriotical devotion to the interests of their country, and for their tried integrity. The direction shall reside in Bologna, under my immediate supervision; a branch of it shall be established in Milan, to facilitate the conveyance of the sums collected, and the correspondence there to referring, with the northern districts of the peninsula. May fortune be as propitious to us as our love to our country is earnest and steady.

E. GARIBALDI."

The railway at the Cape of Good Hope was commenced lately under the Presidency of Sir G. Grey, and the work is being vigorously prosecuted

The emigration from New England to the Pacific still continues quite active.—Many are tempted by the low rates of fare, to give up their occupation here in order to try their luck in the Golden State.

EXTRAORDINARY TRIAL IN FRANCE.

The Tours journals state that a trial which is to take place before the Court of Assizes of the city in December, is exciting extraordinary interest in all the departments of the Indire-et-Loire. A lady who is possessed of a fortune of 400,000 or 500,000f., being separated from her husband, has, since 1851, lived at Chinon with her daughter, who is now about sixteen years of age. She visited in the best society of the town and neighborhood, and towards the end of last year brought out her daughter, who is very pretty. The girl who was thought rather forward in her manners: but that demeanour was attributed to the inconsiderateness of youth.—Before long, however, it became rumored that she was very free with the coachman, and it was stated that the man himself had boasted that he was the lover of his young mistress, and that she was about to become a mother. In January last he disappeared, and Mdme. L—— stated that she had been obliged to discharge him because he had the impudence to ask her daughter's hand in marriage. The mother and daughter afterwards went into society as usual, but they were the subjects of much malevolent remark. Things continued in this state until August last, when the commissary of police of the district received several anonymous letters stating that on the night of the 29th July the young lady had been delivered of a child alive, and that the little creature had been killed by the young lady's mother. As on July 31, the mother and daughter had been seen going about their house and grounds as usual, the commissary attached little importance to the letters; but he communicated them to the public prosecutor, and the latter deemed it right to question the lady. She indignantly declared the statement unfounded, and after some hesitation, laid a complaint of calumnious denunciation against the supposed authors of the letters, and against her ex-coachman. But she was told that in order to support the complaint, it was necessary that her daughter should be examined by a medical man. She consented, though with manifest repugnance; but when a physician a few hours after presented himself at her house she said that the examination was unnecessary, as she was ready to admit that her daughter had been delivered of a child, but that it was born dead, and that she had burned the body—and she declared that her daughter had become enciente, in consequence of violence committed on her by the coachman; she also said that she had been silent on the subject of this violence and had burned the body of the child, from a fear of scandal. On that both mother and daughter were arrested. The young lady at first told the same tale as the mother, but being pressed with questions, she declared that no violence had been used by the coachman, and that the child was not born dead, but had been killed by her mother before being burned. Since then Mdme. L—— has persisted in her original story, and says that in contradicting it, her daughter must be laboring under a hallucination. Both mother and daughter are to be tried for infanticide.

DEATH OF A VETERAN COLONIST.—The Public Ledger of St. Johns, Newfoundland, in giving the death of Edward Colton, Esq., remarks:—"Mr. Colton was a resident of this country for more than half a century, and is one of the last, if not the last, of that class of men who, having by close attention and observation, made themselves thoroughly acquainted with the trade, did much towards its advancement, and the general prosperity of Newfoundland. The mercantile body evinced their esteem of the lamented deceased by displaying their colors at half mast, and by men of all grades by whom he was known his worth was fully appreciated. Although his years were many, yet he was a baleful looking man until disease had laid its fell hand upon him and prostrated him to death, at the advanced age of 69. The deceased gentleman was well known in Upper Canada especially in the neighborhood of Toronto and Woodstock. In the latter place he has relatives who deeply deplore his death.

AN UNFOUNDED CHARGE.—An action was brought at the late Guelph Assizes against Dr. Bowlby, of Berlin, for alleged malpractice in treating a case of leg injured by the kick of a horse. The claim for damages was utterly unsupported by evidence. It was proved on the contrary, that the patient had disobeyed Dr. Bowlby's instructions, and owed the loss of his leg, by amputation, to his own recklessness. A verdict for the defendent was rendered by the jury at once.—Elora Observer.

THE BRITISH NEWSPAPERS READ BY THE POPE.

A correspondent of the N. Y. Times says:—A curious anecdote was told me yesterday, by a person on whose trustworthiness I can fully rely. Being last month in Rome, he availed himself of the opportunity of asking an audience of the Pope, in order to tell him disinterestedly what he knew to be the state of of opinion in this country (England) respecting the affairs of the Peninsula. Pio Nono received him with great urbanity, but lamented with bitterness the sentiments my friend told him animated our leading politicians regarding the Papal administration in civil matters.—"I do not find," he added, "that the English journals speak as ill of my Government as your public men." His visitor rejoined that he had not been aware His Holiness read English. "I have the newspapers sent to me by Mon. signor Talbot, who is an Englishman, and I understand the language sufficiently to follow what is read to me. "Holy Father, that is a dangerous kind of reading for a sovereign ruler," was my friends reply; and he was not sorry for having ventured to give the hint he had done, when the unexpected pontiff volunteered that the only English papers he was told were worth perusing, were the Tablet Weekly Register and Freeman's Journal

NEW YORK, Nov. 28.—A letter from Panama to the Times, states that a battle had been fought at Topic, Mexico, between the Conservatives and Liberals. The later under General Coronado, were defeated, with the lost of 400 killed, Gen. Coronado being among the number. The loss of the Conservatives is unknown. The Liberals fled to Mazatlan. Coronado impressed the British Consul at Mazatlan for refusing to pay duty on specie which had been smuggled from that port on the steamer Calypso; but the commander of the Amethyst released him, and blockaded the port, seizing the Spanish coded ships.

The value of imports entered at the port of Quebec for the first two months of the present year amounts to $2,879,685; last year, for the same period, the imports amounted to $2,704,516, balance in favor of the present year, $175,211. The amount of duties received for the two months of the present year, is $668,577, and for the corresponding period last year, $622,389, showing an augmentation in the present receipt of $73,099 for 1860.

A person supposed to be a female, giving the name of Ann Page, was arrested in Savannah, Ga, on Monday, wearing very extended hoops. Examination showed that the person was a male. He stated his name to be Charles Williams. The Savannah Republican says he converses with all the action and delicate-toned voice of a woman. He is an exquisite counterfeit, and seems up to the art of the sex, assumes the female admirably in his manner, and deportment, wears her clothes gracefully, and they are arranged with a certain degree of taste wholly inconsistent with the habits of males. The Mayor sentenced him to prison for ten days.

SARTLING BUT TRUE! SURVIVE OR PERISH.

HOLLOWAY'S PILL.

The history of this great remedy is the most wonderful medical revelation that the world has ever known. It is not a history written by one man, or even several men, the experiences of one nation, but consists of a compilation of testimonials from the sick of every country—a record, the like of which has never been adduced in favour of any discovery or invention since time began.

BILIOUS DISORDERS.

In whatever form disease attacks the liver, it is repelled and exterminated by this searching, painless and irresistible curative.

Let the sick whom the faculty have abandoned resort with confidence to this antibilious agent, and a restoration to health and activity will be the unvarying result.

DYSPEPSIA.

The great scourge of this continent yields quickly to a course of these antiseptic Pills and the digestive organs are restored to their proper tone; no matter in what hideous shape this hydra of disease exhibits itself, this searching and unerring remedy disperses it from the patient's system.

GENERAL DEBILITY AND WEAKNESS.

From whatever cause, lowness or sinkings, and all other signs of a diseased liver, and other disorganization of the system, vanish under the eradicating influence of this all powerful antiseptic and detergent remedy.

SICKLY FEMALES

Should lose no time in trying a few doses of this regulating and renovating remedy; whatever may be their complaint, it can be taken with safety in all periodical and other disorganizations; its effect is all but miraculous.

Holloway's Pills are the best remedy known in the world for the following diseases:

Asthma,	Headaches,
Bowel Complaints,	Indigestion,
Coughs,	Inflammation,
Colds,	Inward Weakness,
Chest Diseases,	Jaundice,
Costiveness,	Liver Complaints,
Dyspepsia,	Lowness of Spirits,
Diarrhœa,	Piles,
Dropsy,	Stone and Gravel,
Debility,	Secondary Symptoms,
Fever and Ague,	Venereal Affections,
Female Complaints,	Worms of all kinds.

☞ CAUTION.—None are genuine unless the words "Holloway, New York and London," are discernible as a Water-mark in every leaf of the book of directions around each pot or box; the same may be plainly seen by holding the leaf to the light. A handsome reward will be given to any one rendering such information as may lead to the detection of any party or parties counterfeiting the medicines or vending the same, knowing them to be spurious.

☞ Sold at the Manufactory of Professor Holloway, 80 Maiden Lane, New York, and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicine throughout the United States and the civilized world, in boxes at 25 cents, 63 cents and $1 each.

☞ There is a considerable saving by taking the larger sizes.

☞ N. B.—Directions for the guidance of patients in every disorder are affixed to each box.

Selected Poetry.

A Wreck.

BY A. M'LACHLAN.

Andrew was once the village pride,
And oft neath the yew tree shade,
Both old and young,
With rapture hung
On the wondrous words he said.
But now to the public bar he stands,
With the dirty drinking crew,
A clouding set,
In a threadbare coat,
And his elbows peeping through.

How changed from the time he touched our hearts
As if by a magic wand,
And we thought that he
Would one day be
A wonder in the land;
For while he spake the ages all
Seemed open to the view
Of that gathering set,
In the threadbare coat,
With lips of living blue.

And from the wreck of old belief
What wondrous forms he drew
And how he wrought
Disjointed thought
Into pictures strange and new.
Who could have dreamed this mournful change
Would ever come to pass;
A seedy set
In a threadbare coat,
Alas! ever alas!

Is this the man of the loving heart,
Who knew no crook nor wile?
For he was free,
As man could be,
From everything like guile.
His sense of moral worth remains,
Yet he'll do the thing that's mean,
A sneaking act
In a threadbare coat,
He sinks to the obscene.

He still presents the lordly brow,
And the great black flashing eyes,
But Wan despair
Is seated there
With "the worm that never dies."
The princely port, and the regal air,
And the stately tread are gone—
A palsied sot
In a threadbare coat,
To the grave he staggers on.

The ghost of his former self will come
And try to break his chain,
He'll cause the cup
And he'll give it up,
But he seeks it once again.
How mournful are his lips and jaws,
How sad to hear him sing—
That joyless sot,
In the threadbare coat,
That God-forgotten thing.

The dream of his boyhood haunts him still,
It comes but to annoy,
But he stills the cup,
And he stains it up,
And laughs like the ghost of joy.
The wreck of a richly laden soul
Is surely a fearful thing;
Oh shun the lot
Of that sinking sot
Whose dying dirge we sing.

The French Press and the Invasion of England.

From the London Times.

The power of the press in any country can only be measured by the weight of that portion of the community whose opinion it represents. In this country where freedom of speech is no crime, the press can only exist by reflecting, and in some degree [illegible] which most animate the most intelligent portion of the community, however modified by the different political sections into which it is divided. It is emphatically the organ of a self-governing people; and while it faithfully exposes their political differences, their quarrels and their weakness, it no less truly represents their united sentiments upon questions which touch the dignity and welfare of the nation itself. It is therefore generally in advance of the Government as an exponent of public opinion, and, whether its conclusions be right or wrong, the Government is in no way responsible for them. Hence the opinions which it pronounces on the policy and conduct of foreign rulers, however much in accordance with the sentiments of the community at large, are not to be regarded as expositions of the views of Cabinets, nor can they in any way compromise the Government of the day.

It is far otherwise with the French Press. That institution exists—it cannot be said to grow—in a close and murky atmosphere, in which free discussion cannot breathe, and can only be said to represent public opinion so far as that opinion is in accordance with the policy of the Government. The practice of signing each article with the name of the writer, which the French law requires, and which the few avowed enemies of the English Press would fain have seen it, strips journalism in France of its [illegible] character, and subjects it to an [illegible] to higher authority than that which belongs to each individual who contributes to it. Yet, while the French Press loses in weight as an organ of public opinion, it gains all as an exponent of the views and wishes of the Government. M. A. or B. indeed disowns pen to ink, and signs his name, but the Emperor or his Ministers suggest, write, [illegible], correct, and, if necessary, what is to be written. This is the obvious consequence of the French law to this subject. Hence the assumed tendency of a portion of the French Press against this country have a significance far greater than the mere opinions of the collaborateurs responsible for them. They are almost or [illegible] the views of the Government, and the Government is [illegible]. It is not surprising that the [illegible] that evinced towards England, coupled with their [illegible] of a more favourable character elsewhere, should have produced their natural results.

They have succeeded in doing what, among [illegible] the most distinguished [illegible] and the personal influence of the Duke of Wellington himself failed to effect—they have succeeded in [illegible] the country of the absolute necessity of being [illegible] and prepared for all events to encounter [illegible] which may arise from the [illegible] of the Emperor of the French. [illegible] have been [illegible] to [illegible] the [illegible] of [illegible] and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

Town Councillors.

It is important that a good selection for the Council be made at the approaching Municipal election. Never, perhaps, in the history of the Town, did greater caution need to be displayed in our local legislation, and the misgivings with any of every the necessity of placing in power, men who will prevent the Town Trust drifting further into the "slough of pecuniary embarrassment." There is no better rule that we know of in selecting Councillors, than to prevent individuals from entering that body whatever, or what may be their way interested by bias or sinister motives. We stated on a former occasion as our belief, that there were gentlemen in the present Council who were above such betrayals their fair any more interest in, or anxiety for the prosperity of the Municipality than their neighbors, but because they had no views objects in the most selfish, and under the most misunderstand that these were the images that clouded their vision at that time." Without any desire to cast a slur upon the past conduct of the Council, we are persuaded that a prudent consideration will enable every ratable mind to come to a conclusion. We could cite several incidents in proof of the position, but the most prominent will serve our purpose. It is needless to say that the majority of our readers will carefully attend to have the Council composed of "practical men of business" to the exclusion of "theorists and visionaries." Above all, we would say to the ratepayers, mature careful selections for the Council, and before voting for any man, ascertain yourselves that he is of the right stamp, and will not sell you, or allow himself to be sold.

In justice to several of the gentlemen who are members of the present Council, we would say it is not intended that they by any means come under the above strictures. We will mention no names on this occasion, but may take another opportunity of touching at greater length into the subject.

Rumseller and his Associates.

We learn with unfeigned pleasure that the court in Toronto last week passed sentence upon three of the men who have made themselves notorious in election frauds. We refer to George Bryte Lyon Fellowes the issue-vendor and agent for the County of Russell, and the two Campbells, father and son, the former agent and scrutineer for Fellowes, the latter the Poll Clerk at the election in the Township of Cumberland. The Rebel frauds in they are called in Scripture, to all our readers. [illegible] was, villainous, upwards of 200 fictitious votes were recorded by

TOWN COUNCIL.

The Council met on Monday night.—Present, the Mayor, Messrs. Cooper, White, Fowler, Bethell, Bradley, Kennedy, Morrison and Hall.

An opinion from Mr. Wilson as to the best means to [illegible] to the injury done by Mr. Fowler, also as to the position of the Town in reference to the Lease and Mortgage of the Millbrook Branch Railway, was read.

A petition from Mr. Aitken expressing regret at [illegible] former petition for reduction of price demanded for a Shop License, and offering $60 for a license if half should be refunded him again, was read and laid on the table.

A Report from the Charity Committee, recommending a free license to Benjamin Reynolds for the balance of the year, was received and adopted.

The Clerk was ordered to correct any errors in the Collector's Roll.

Mr. Clinton, the Trustee on behalf of the Town for the Millbrook Branch was requested to correspond with Mr. Smart, the Trustee for Port Hope, asking what steps his Municipality were going to take in order to obtain the interest due by Messrs. Tate and Fowler for the Branch, and if he (Mr. Smart) would consent to an action being at once taken in the Queen's Bench, to recover the amount due.

A By-Law [illegible] Mr. Wilson the Arbitrator for the Town, on the Separation from the County, was passed.

The use of the Town Hall was granted to Mr. McLachlan the Scotch Canadian Poet, for his Lectures on Monday and Tuesday evenings next.

It was agreed to grant the prayer of the Petition of Mr. Aitken for a reduction of his License.

The Council adjourned for one week.

NARROW ESCAPE.—A lad named Gilchrist, while driving a [illegible] in which was a daughter of Mr. Chas. Perry, during the snow storm on Friday last, narrowly escaped being run over by the noon train from Port Hope. He was driving along Sherbrook Street in the direction of the railway, but was not aware that the train was so near at hand, nor did the driver perceive any danger until he had passed the residence of Mr. Fowler, when he pulled on the horse, but could not bring it to a stand before it had crossed the track. Nothing apparently being in the way, the train was coming at a good speed when it came in contact with the horse; the buggy was upset and Gilchrist and Miss Perry were thrown a considerable distance, fortunately beyond the reach of the locomotive, but the horse was killed instantly. We have often remarked that the speed of the cars was too great when coming so far into the Town but we understand they may lawfully run at the rate of 6 miles per hour. The above circumstance ought to caution parties when nearing the railway crossings with vehicles to be very cautious.

TO MERCHANTS AND OTHERS.—Now is the time to advertise your business. New Year's is nearing, Christmas is at hand, and if you have goods to dispose of the people ought to know it, and no better medium can be found for that purpose than the Examiner, it having a large Town and County circulation, well printed and read by everybody.

To our readers we would say if they wish to know where the best bargains can be had, before purchasing let them look over our advertisement columns. As a general rule it is only the liberal and enterprising merchant who advertises. The old drones and slow-coaches in business who have kept their goods on hand for years, being afraid to spend a dollar in advertising, ought to be made keep them a little longer. "Quick sales and small profits" is the manner of conducting business now-a-days, and he who has put this for his motto is decidedly behind the times.

THE COUNTIES' COUNCIL adjourned on Saturday afternoon last. The business (except the separation affair) was of little importance; the Council refusing to accept the offer of the Town as the seat of justice, but it was agreed to leave the matter to arbitration. R. D. Rogers, Esq., Ashburnham, was appointed arbitrator on the part of the County.

☞ In our report of the St. Andrew's Dinner last week, we neglected to state that a despatch from T. Short, Esq., M. P. P., was read, apologizing for his absence. An unexpected and unavoidable business engagement prevented Mr. Short from being present.

NOTICE OF PUBLICATIONS.

LIFE OF ALEX. MCLACHLAN.—This [illegible] early got up. Both editions of [illegible] Mr. McLachlan, whose thickness [illegible] commend to another column. We [illegible] this week, by reference to which [illegible] Lectures, which [illegible] thoroughly the true spirit of poetry. of University Reform was before the public to place the endowment of King's College in the hands of several denominations instead of one, it would have been properly rejected; and we cannot think that there has been no great a retrogression in public sentiment during the last ten years, that what would then have been rejected with indignation will now be accepted by the Legislature. In view of the necessity of a proposition of the nature of that before us, we are bound to follow it into all its inevitable consequences. If the request of the advocates of Victoria College is to prevail; if funds now devoted to an efficient University education are to be diverted to sectarian purposes, how can the way open for a system of Common Schools be prevented from being successful? And what is to become of the Normal School? If the necessity of sectarian education at the latter period of life, when the student is ready to enter upon his college course, be admitted, how is the same necessity at a younger and a more tender period of his existence, when the mind is more liable to receive impressions without reflection, to be denied? The Normal School is on the efficiency which exists for the training of teachers; and if it be desirable that Colleges endowed with public money should be under sectarian control, how much more desirable must it be that the Normal School should be placed on a similar position! It is bad enough, to our minds, that one of these systems is inevitable. If we are to have a system of education it must be sectarian, for the moment it becomes sectarian in all its departments, from the school to the college, it ceases to be national, and in a very short time the State would thereby it offers no incentive, if a majority were not found to insist upon its reform. It is better that we should prevent the necessity by the first stumpstone, and so put an end to all further attempt at sectarian encroachment upon the system which has been established.

THE MURDER ON BOARD THE "Sloop-of-War" Bepublic!!

REVOLTING CRUELTY.

We have been placed in possession of a letter addressed to the sister of a George Ritter, the young man from this city who was cruelly beaten to death on board the United States sloop-of-war Brooklyn, while laying in New York Bay, off Staten Island. That such devilish acts of torture should be perpetrated on board American ships of war, in the presence of naval officers in a harbour classic to our country, and a disgrace to the flag we are so proud to boast of.

The letter is signed by twelve of the men who were eye-witnesses to the revolting spectacle, and from it we make some extracts:

After breaking to a sister the death of her brother, in as gentle words as a sailor's rough heart can do; the statement is, that on the 7th of November the deceased was ordered in confinement by Lieut. Mitchell the officer of the dark. A mate, and the ship corporal, named Charles Cooper, ordered Ritter and dragged him to the main hatch, when Cooper took him by the legs and pulled him down the ship, his head striking each step of the ladder as he was drawn down. After this Sergeant Ray, struck Ritter in the face with his clenched fist, several times, and then kicked him in the face saying, "If ever — — — —, if I ever catch you on the beach I'll murder you." Ray afterwards grabbed him by the hair, beat his head against the deck, and then ordered Cooper to bring him a gag. The order was obeyed, and Cooper refused to give Ray the gag, saying he would gag him. Cooper then held Ritter, head on the deck, with upwards, and taking the gag in both hands, tried to force it into his mouth. Not succeeding in doing so, he pushed his clenched fist and struck Ritter several times in the mouth.

He then raised up head, and then putting his knee to the back of his neck, forced his jaws upward with the gag. (The gag is about four inches in circumference and a foot in length.) The gag was then tied eighty around Ritter's head, after which he was thrown against the bulkhead, where he lay for twenty minutes, having every appearance of a corpse. Acting-Sergeant Powell subsequently came in and gave orders to the sentinels not to permit any one to interfere with Ritter, or remove the gag from his mouth. 'About fifteen minutes after words, Cooper came in and was told that Ritter was suffocating. He pulled him up and looked at him, and then threw him back against the bulkhead, saying, "D—n him let him lay." A sentinel shortly afterwards examined Ritter and found he was cold, which fact was reported to Sergeant Welsh. The gag was then cut from his mouth, and the dead body was then taken out of the double irons and the surgeon notified.

The witnesses to the transaction were kept in double irons, and not allowed to appear at the coroner's inquest, or communicate with any person whatever. A Cooper, one of the principal murderers, was allowed to go on shore by Capt. Farragut, and would have escaped, had not the boat's crew called to the officers on Staten Island to arrest him, as he was a murderer.—Some of the officers desired to detain the boat's crew as witnesses, but the officer in charge gave his word of honor, as an officer and a gentleman, that he would return to the shore with Capt. Farragut and the same boat's crew. The boat was hoisted up as soon as it reached the ship, and the latter immediately proceeded to sea.

The commission of any city of which this ship may arrive should cause the arrest of the parties implicated in this atrocious murder, and the Secretary of the Navy will be read, so as I in the premises as becomes an officer who cherishes any regard for the honor and the name of humanity.—Phila. Press, Nov. 20th.

Selected Poetry.

The Miser's Doom.

"I love the joyous laugh of youth—
The blooming rosy cheek—
The ruby lip, and hazel eye
That seems almost to speak.

"'Tis as the flow of gentle spring—
The budding of the year—
When birds melodious music make,
Our lonely hearts to cheer.

"Angelic state! who would not wish
To live it o'er again—
To tread its fairy paths once more,
Amid the youthful train?"

Thus spoke an old and feeble man,
Of three score years or more,
Whose snowy locks and wrinkled face
Bespoke his days near o'er.

But while in youth he heeded not
The light and gladsome heart,
For riches were his ideal God—
To gain it was his heart.

He labored much and labored long—
He broke the Sabbath day,
And scrupled not to do an act—
Provided it would pay.

But age was slowly creeding on,
And with it riches came:
They brought no comfort to his heart;
Instead—a scorching flame.

And then he sat from day to day
And brooded o'er the past,
Until old Death swept by his door
And took him off at last.

Death laid him in a distant land
And turned him into gold,
Which by the miner was dug up,
And to the broker sold.

But as they put him in the scale
A horrid groan was heard;
A sneaky sapper then rose up,
But none dared speak a word.

All were striken to the floor,
And on their faces fell:
A demon hand—it grasped the scale
And took it down to hell.

And lonely there the old man sits
Amid a sea of gold,
That sparkles bright and dims the sight
Of misers young and old.

CATCHING A MINISTER.

BY JOHN THORNBERRY.

When the reverend and quite young Mr. Markov came to preach with us at our village, it was generally supposed that he would either be obliged to bring a wife along with him, or consent to suffer martyrdom at the hands of the gossips of the town. Many people esteemed it a highly inconsiderate thing, that he should have the audacity, to come among us without so much as declaring his intentions on the subject. It was hardly what was expected from a "beardless boy," but a little time from the seminary, and of course profoundly ignorant of the ways of the world of our village.

But come he did, whether it was presumption in him or not; and come without a wife, or a word about a wife, too. And he had scarcely been installed in the place where he expected to pass the vigor and strength of his life, when the inquisition began its labors in downright earnestness. The moment they understood him well enough to know how to take him, they did "take him with a vengeance."

Of the multitudinous sheeps' eyes that were thrown at him in the desk from behind hymn books, fans, and other Sunday ornaments of a like character, it is unnecessary here to speak. What precise effect they had upon him, no human being seemed to know. He endured them as stolidly as one of the Egyptian pyramids would endure the gaze of a party of blinking and winking travelers.

But of all those who set their hearts on the poor man, on their own especial account, none excelled, in point of perseverance and enthusiasm, like Miss Ann Tippit. She had the ill fortune, besides, to be pretty well advanced in the years when a young lady is supposed to be most charming, and stiff she assumed airs that would have been a fair topic of satire even in a giddy young miss of sixteen. To be short, her aims and her age were at sixes and sevens with her. She wanted bad enough to marry a young candidate, but still she never would remember that she herself was growing old. It was unfortunate for Miss Ann; but pray, whose fault could it be?

Next in order, in point of tenacity of purpose, came the Widow Duke; not on her own account, I beg to be understood, but solely and altogether on that of her only daughter Fanny.

Ah, but Fanny Duke was a "young thing," though; and she was shrewd and obedient enough to do as her mother bade her, and she understood something of the influence of coquetry besides, and the secret fascination of smiles. Fanny knew in a moment upon whom her mother had her eye, you may be sure, and she put her eye on the same spot, just as quick as she could get it there. There was quite a difference, too, between herself and Miss Ann Tippet, in point of years; a circumstance that has very often more to do with a match, or anything of that sort, than almost any other. Fanny was fresh and blushing, like a rose-bud in June; whereas, in Ann's face a very close observer, such as a lover would be rather likely to be, might possibly detect a stray blemish or wrinkle.

In our town the ladies kept a sewing-circle ageing, especially during the winters. It is then that they come out in all their individual demonstrative force. Mrs. Sleeting and [illegible]; Mrs. Somebody-else (she [illegible] made me promise I would not [illegible] in the newspapers) was vice [illegible] treasurer; Mrs. [illegible] Miss [illegible] secretary; and Mrs. [illegible] together [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

"Romans, xiii. 13. Let us walk honestly as in the day; not in rioting and drunkenness, not in chambering and wantonness, not in strife and envying.

"Galatians, v. 19. Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these; adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, envyings, murders, drunkenness, revellings, and such like; of the which I tell you before, as I have also told you in time past, that they which do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God.

"Ephesians, v. 3. But fornication, and all uncleanness, or covetousness, let it not be once named among you, as becometh saints.

"Ephesians, v. 5. For this ye know, that no whoremonger, nor unclean person, nor covetous man, who is an idolater, hath any inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and God.

"Colossians, iii. 5. Mortify therefore your members which are upon the earth; fornication, uncleanness, inordinate affection, evil concupiscence, and covetousness, which is idolatry.

"Colossians, iii. 8. But now ye also put off all these; anger, wrath, malice, blasphemy, filthy communication out of your mouth.

"Colossians, iii. 9. Lie not one to another, seeing that ye have put off the old man with his deeds.

"Timothy, vi. 10. For the love of money is the root of all evil, which while some coveted after, they have erred from the faith, and pierced themselves through with many sorrows.

"Revelations, xxi. 8. But the fearful, and unbelieving, and the abominable, and murderers, and whoremongers, and sorcerers, and idolaters, and all liars, shall have their part in the lake which burneth with fire and brimstone, which is the second death."

The Russell Reform Association.

A short time ago we submitted to our readers the Constitution of the Reform Association, at that time we were led to believe immediate action would be taken by the delegates to the Toronto Convention, to organize branch Associations in the County. We confess we are surprised at the inactivity of those gentlemen in the move; they must be aware that on them devolves the duty of organization, and we are confident that the stone once set rolling nothing could stand in the way of success. We would caution our Reform friends against over-confidence or reliance in the public mind; many who were warm in the last campaign may be indifferent now, and many who were formerly against us would gladly join our ranks if we had any means of acknowledging them as friendly.

The Reform party having since last session gained the addition of several prominent members of the House, it is believed the first vote in the next session will be "non-confidence." The Cartier Government may be executed, and in such case a dissolution of Parliament will be applied for and probably granted.

Washington wisely cancelled his countrymen, "in time of peace" to "prepare for war." It is no time when the excitement of a general election commences that we should raise the cry of "Organization."—We must needs be already organized, and prepared for the struggle, if we would make certain a victory. We hope we may not be again compelled to spur the Reformers of the County to energy, but that steps will immediately be taken to organize Branch Reform Associations in every Township.

Nomination.—Monday next, 19th Dec. is the day appointed for Nomination of Candidates for the office of Mayor. Mr. Sawers will probably be elected by acclamation.

A Suggestion.

We observe that it is the intention of the St. George's Society in Toronto to distribute gratuitously, to the English poor of that city, on the day before Christmas, meat, bread, potatoes, and wood. Donations of money or provisions in aid of the object are invited from the public.

We would suggest to the officers of the St. Andrew's Society of Peterboro', the idea of following the example of the St. George's of Toronto. There is money in the treasury, and we know of no better or more fitting way of disposing it, than in the plan above suggested, and we believe many of our citizens would most willingly assist. There are many poor people in the Town, some begging from door to door, and who would be thankful for the smallest gift.—While we feel grateful for the return of another Christmas, and with it peace and plenty, let us "remember the poor." We would not recommend confining the distribution of charities to the Scotch poor, however, or to the poor of any particular creed or country, but to our suffering fellow-men.

The "Examiner."—We would call the attention of our city contemporaries, the Globe and Colonist, to the difference between the Examiner of Peterboro', and the Examiner of Stratford. Many times we have been annoyed to find extracts from this journal copied by our city friends and credited to the Stratford Examiner; at other times articles giving us credit for ideas and sentiments which we were not altogether prepared to endorse, and which undoubtedly belonged to our Stratford namesake. A ridiculous instance of this mistaken credit appeared in last Thursday's Globe. In giving a list of candidates for the Mayoralty of the towns in Canada West, Mr. Sawers, (Peterboro',) is set down as a Candidate for the Mayoralty of Stratford!

The Genesee Farmer.—The December number of this old and reliable Agricultural Monthly is received. A new volume commences with the January number. Now is the time to subscribe. The Genesee Farmer is the cheapest agricultural and horticultural journal in the world. Only half a dollar a year, for a volume containing three hundred and eighty-four large octavo pages, with an index and title page suitable for binding. No farmer or Bibl-grower should be without an agricultural and horticultural journal, and we can confidently recommend the Genesee Farmer to our readers as one of the very best published. Address, Joseph Harris, Rochester.

Our subscribers can have the Examiner and the Genesee Farmer for 1860 for $1.50c. the two.

Village of Omemee.—The Rose Inclosure belonging to refugee Mr. Rose Crow, is to be sold this day at the Court House in Peterboro, given the village a very high name, but we think Thomas Tomkins the manager of other business connected with the Inclosure, will not be sorry to see the last of it.

TOWN COUNCIL.

On Monday the 12th inst., the Town Council met. The Mayor and ten members were present.

Petitions from Widow Wilson, John Wilson, and John Cousins, praying for abatement of taxes, were read and referred.

Three petitions for Licenses at reduced prices, were read and laid on the table.—A sort of interrogatory from H. Crean was also read.

Accounts from Mr. Rutherford, for work; from McDougall, Surveying; and Thomas Benyis, for cedar posts, were referred to Finance, and Streets & Bridge committees.

A By-Law was introduced and passed, naming the Returning Officers, and the places for the coming elections. The former Returning Officers were appointed with the exception of Mr. O'Beirne, Mr. G. Bell is named instead.

The time for the Collector paying in the taxes was extended to the 30th inst.

A resolution instructing the Mayor to give applicants their Licenses for half price, was passed, and another ordering the Street and Bridge Committee to build a side-walk in front of the Catholic Church.

The Council adjourned for one week.

The Russell Election.—At the nomination for the County of Russell on Friday last, Mr. C. Comer withdrew, leaving Mr. Loux (the rightful incumbent) and Dr. Hunter, for the contest. Mr. Loux had the show of hands, but Dr. Hunter demanded a poll. The polling days are to-morrow and Saturday. The Ottawa Citizen says:—

"The Russell County nomination, which took place yesterday indicated pretty strongly the feeling of the County. The electors are unwilling to believe that the wrong under which they have smarted shall be continued, or that the County shall become a by-word and reproach throughout Canada. They have spirit enough to feel the indignity which has been forced upon them, and to resist its continuance in any form or by any person. It is much to be regretted that Dr. Hunter has placed himself in opposition to Mr. Loux at this time, as it only forces upon the County an immense amount of trouble and vexatious annoyance, in a case where in justice and equity there should have been unanimity in sustaining Mr. Loux, who was honestly elected already, and at this moment is of right, and should be the member for the County.

Although the election of Mr. Loux, appears certain and safe, the electors must not close their eyes to the danger of over-confidence. It is the duty of each one to exert himself. Many an election has been lost by reason of people feeling that exertion was not necessary. That feeling should not be permitted for a moment. Let every man be vigilant and active, and be up to his duty, and the result is safe beyond question."

"Incendiary Documents."—Under cover of a decision lately given by the Post Master General of the United States, that all incendiary, or, in other words, pro-slavery documents, might be prevented by post-masters from passing into the slave-holding states, a postmaster in Virginia has refused to deliver the N.Y. Tribune from his office. The following correspondence results:—

"Post-office, Lynchburgh, Va.,
Dec. 2. 1859.

"Mr. Horace Greeley.

"Sir:—I hereby inform you that I shall not, in future, deliver from this office the copies of the Tribune which come here, because I believe them to be of that incendiary character which are forbidden circulation alike by the laws of the land, and a proper regard for the safety of society. You will, therefore, discontinues them.

"Respectfully,
"R. H. GLASS, P. M."

REPLY.

"Mr. Postmaster of Lynchburgh, Va.

"Sir,—I take leave to assure you that I shall do nothing of the sort. The subscribers to the Tribune in Lynchburgh have paid for their papers; we have taken their money, and shall fairly and fully earn it, according to the contract. If they direct us to send their papers to some other post-office, we shall obey the request; otherwise, we shall send them as originally ordered. If you or your masters choose to steal and destroy them, that is your affair—at all events, not ours; and if there is no law in Virginia to punish the larceny, as much the worse for her and our plundered subscribers. If the Federal Administration, whereof you are the tool, after monopolizing the business of mail-carrying, sees fit to become the accomplice and patron of mail-robbery, I suppose the outrage must be borne until more honest and less servile rulers can be put into high places at Washington, or till the people can recover their natural right to carry each other's letters and printed matter, asking no odds of the Government.—Go a-head in your own bees way; I shall stand steadfast for human liberty and protection of all natural rights.

"Yours ruly,
"HORACE GREELEY.

COMMUNICATION.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

Portland, Dec. 2, 1857.

When leaving Peterboro' for Portland, in September last, I promised, in return for former favors, both to the Examiner and Review, some report of the Great Eastern, &c., whose anticipated arrival here was then occupying the general mind. And this promise I certainly should have kept had the Big Ship not shamefully disappointed us; for I would be unwilling to leave you without "the news" with, like the old Jewish garment, it had arrived at second hand.

"What Englishmen say, they mean to do." Such was the very significant response (droll Yankee questioning) and the determination elsewhere made which the corporation and citizens of Portland expended four millions of dollars by inviting things in order to "do the honors" to the foreigners! Perhaps you may be sure that no such spirit, whatever may be said to the contrary, influenced any of the public men here; but that the whole affair was got up in the most liberal and generous manner, and with the single view of doing honor to the illustrious guests, is beyond question. Of course, the whole country was on the tip-toe of excitement, and the people, from the highest to the lowest, were all anxiety to see the young Prince of Wales, together with many of the beauty and chivalry of Merry England, coming to celebrate the opening of the Victoria Bridge, with the first breath of Spring. Meantime we are happy to hear of her delightful promenades in the British Channel, her etiquette with the navy, and her interchange of loud-sounding compliments with Cherbourg, and en attendant; I shall proclaim her arrival at this port by a few remarks upon beautiful Portland.

Every health seeker, every pleasure or leisure seeker, every "honeymoon" tourist can speak of it. Who has not heard of Cape Cottage, where so many bridal dreams have been realized! Crossing over from Montreal, one is borne, as in a dream, with the flying locomotive, for the better part of two days, through one unbroken diorama of the most varied scenery. The peaceful fields and picturesque villages of Lower Canada soon retire, and are replaced by the rude romantic townships, which disappear in their turn in favor of the myriad miniature Alps of Vermont, that beset the track for many miles, like silent guardians placed there long ago by Nature to keep off, and completely out of view, every living thing. There are sundry small village-interruptions, as at Island Pond, the White Mountains, &c., to this lonely route through Vermont. It being late in "the fall" I looked in vain, in friendly imitation of the Yankees seated about me, for the constant causes of their unbroken ecstacy, right and left; but my fellow travellers had been there before, when the glory of summer gladdened these hills. The quickening breath of that joyous season may make a rustic paradise of the place; but when the chill winter comes, and the melancholy spirits of the North are heard there in the bleak blast and the mourning night winds, it must appear a fit scene for arrow and dispairing gloom. Bounding away from here, the meadows and mansions of Maine salute the eye, and soon one finds himself in presence of the proud promontory upon which Portland sits enthroned, with the eternal tides bathing her surrounding beach—surrounding except where the isthmus of connection with the mainland causes an interruption and constitutes a causeway to her throne. The view is not the best which the approach form Montreal, viâ the Grand Trunk, offers; it is only seaward the city can best be seen. Looking at it from Cape Cottage, at the grand entrance from the ocean, or from any one of the sundry islands, large or small, which stand out against the Atlantic like a mighty break-water and preserve all the shipping within the Casco Bay from its fury, one sees a city of terraces ranging in long lines of architectural beauty, the one above the other, as they recede, until they reach the crescentic or last range. It is thus, too, the city looks from across the Bay to the country in the rear. This site is unsurpassed, and so will be the architectural grandeur of Portland. The population numbers, perhaps, 40,000 or 50,000; but to one accustomed to other cities, where filthy suburbs and crowded habitations abound, the numbers here give no adequate idea of the magnitude and magnificence of the city, where even the poor daily laborers have their own decent dwellings paid for and secured in real estate for ever.

The activity of business in this place is greater in the winter when the Canadian steamers touch it weekly. But, talking of these, I cannot avoid expressing the regret felt on all sides at the deplorable loss of the Indian, together with so many valuable human lives. You, doubtless, are this know the particulars of the sad calamity, so that I need not recapitulate here what has already appeared in almost every newspaper in the country; besides, I do not desire to be a chronicler of woe to any family either in Canada or on the Continent.

The winter seems very unwilling to visit us, there did fall a few flakes of snow the other night, but the streets are quite dry and clean, and there is comfort yet in the slanted sunbeam.

The San Juan obstacle to the speedy construction of a Pacific railway viâ British Territory will perhaps be soon removed; if not it ought to be by the united guarantee, in the shape of a treaty of neutrality of all the first-class powers. If the world is to have a highway the powers thereof ought to portect it; and this not only at its termini at the seaboards, but throughout its entire way. Round such a mighty backbone, then, there would be developed in time a Canadian nation fit to take the rule of empire (as empire comes from the north) when all others had passed away. By-the-by, where might then be your present party squabbles when the crumbling skulls of your present statesmen will stick like Poor Yorick's in the hand of Hamlet? But Adieu,

AMICUS.

Mayoralty of New York.

The Charter Election in this city has resulted in the defeat of Messrs. Havemeyer and Opdyke, and the triumph of Fernando Wood. The vote was as follows!—Wood, 30,125; Havemeyer, 26,843: Opdyke, 31,773. Plurality for Wood over Havemeyer, 3,285,—nearly the same as the majority for Tieman (3,331) over Wood in 1857. The aggregate vote cast was 78,741—less by 4,692 than the total polled at the election of 1857. Havemeyer ran 5,070 ahead of Opdyke; while Wood's majority over Opdyke, 8,352. The united vote of Opdyke and Havemeyer is 48,616; Wood polling at this election but 30,122 votes against 39,951 in 1857—a loss of 9,886. The returns for Counsel to the Corporation show that Mr. Greene C. Bronson has received over 30,000 votes, and is elected by a plurality of 7,861 over Tilden—being double the amount of Wood's plurality. Mr. Pinckney, the Astor House Governor upon the Republican ticket, is thrown by a handsome vote.

The day passed off much more quietly than there was reason to anticipate. There were some street fights in the wards which are most famous for such encounters on election day; and there were some arrests for illegal voting; but none of the former attained the dignity of a row, and the latter were uncommonly few. Around the newspaper offices in the evening enormous crowds congregated, read the returns as they were placed on the bulletins, and, according to the degree of satisfaction which she inspection gave each, retired in silence, or remained till midnight shouting vociferously. There were huge gatherings at the head-quarters of the several political organizations during the evening, and at each, the returns which were welcome, were received with shouts of approbation, and those which were otherwise with expressions of dissatisfaction. Fernando Wood made a characteristic speech at Mozart Hall when it became apparent that he was elected, in which he returned his acknowledgments for the honor, and promised to vote exactly as he had done before.

The Coming Struggle and the Catholic Church.

(From the Scottish American Journal.)

The regard of every week's intelligence tends to confirm the theory that we are on the eve of a great crisis, when the spiritual no less than the material interests of Christendom will come into collision. Those who would assign the hostile demonstrations that are now manifesting themselves on all sides to no deeper cause than the selfishness of the French monarch, and the irritable disposition of the French and British peoples, take an entirely false and shallow view indeed of what is in reality the conflict of great principles and momentous interests. The Italian question, with its brief but bloody war, and its now unsettled position, pregnant with future consequences, seems but the prelude to a contest of the most complicated and terrible nature, in which the political rights, the religious beliefs, and the national interests of different communities are to be tried in an ordeal not less fierce perhaps than any of which the modern world has had experience. Louis Napoleon, who was the instrument by which this evil spirit was evoked, is evidently losing control of the demon which for selfish purposes he has called into active life. While he has presumptuously been dealing with the Italian question the partizans of the Church have been dealing with him, and their influence, at first exercised in France alone, is now being put forth in every civilized community. From all countries the slavish priesthood of Rome are calling to him to become the champion of Papal pretensions and offering to him every inducement to pursue a career which may divert from its original direction, the blood-thirsty appetite he has engendered, and lead it on in a crusade which strikes at once at Protestant belief and the civil liberty of all communities, whether Protestant or Catholic. There can no longer be any doubt as to the share which the priesthood have had in arousing the anti-British passions of the French people. In Ireland they are throwing off the slight mask which has heretofore covered without concealing their traitorous and greedy propensities; and even here, in this land of democratic freedom and equality, every Popish priest is using his influence, and every Catholic print is pouring forth its fiercest invectives, in favor of the crusade against Protestantism, liberty, and the hated power of England.

That the French Emperor will ultimately place himself at the head of this movement, and seek to turn it as he best may to his own account, there is little reason to doubt. This is scarcely a matter of choice on his part, indeed. If he goes to war with Britain in behalf of those impulses of French ambition which it has been his more special object to cultivate, he must accept the Church as his ally, and this, of course, she can only be on the condition of subserviency on his part with reference to the antagonism of the Papal power to popular rights and liberties in Italy and elsewhere. On this condition, and this alone, he will have the co-operation everywhere and in all countries of a powerful priesthood, whose allegiance to Rome is superior to that which they acknowledge to any temporal power. This alliance, therefore, may be regarded as in a fair way of becoming an accomplished fact: for however much the French Emperor may desire to have his own way with reference to what he has been so foolish as to consider the possible reform of the Papal Administration, it is evident that he must perforce abandon that idea and sacrifice his personal views to a greater moral force than his own.

Against this combined movement of the Catholic Church, the friends, not merely of Protestantism, but of human freedom, are now called to unite in energetic preparation. They have the advantage, in this instance, of not having provoked the collision, which arises entirely out of that tyranny of the Papal Government which accused even the sovereign of a Catholic people to intervene for its mitigation. The Papacy is now not merely engaged in a work of self-defence, or if it can pretend that such is its objects, it is promoting it by the ancient method of carrying the war into the enemy's country. It seeks to make wherever Protestants exert a moral influence in behalf of the cause of which Italy is but the centre and theatre of action; and from making a mere diversion in favor of the Papal Government, it is encouraged by the prospect of success to entertain enlarged designs of aggression and conquest on its own account. Being better organised and under more systematic drill, it has been able to take the start of the Protestant interest, and it is now time that the latter should thoroughly awake to a sense of the peril with which it is threatened; the greatest, beyond all question, since the day when sovereigns fought and martyrs died in protest against the tyranny of Rome. In the nineteenth century that tyranny is necessarily worse than it was in the sixteenth, as being more repugnant to the spirit of the time; but Protestantism, in the most enlarged sense, will, in this age, we have no doubt, show itself more powerful than ever. Under the leadership of Britain it will give good account of all comers, and though the struggle may be severe, it will vindicate the cause of progress against the powers of darkness and oppression.

We put forth these ideas in no spirit of blind repugnance to the Catholic Church. We have never participated in the anti-Popery sentiment, as that is want to be indulged by many people, in season and out of season. Our freedom from prejudice, in this matter, has allowed us to have opportunities of making personal acquaintance with the spirit of the system, as it is represented by the priesthood on both sides of the Atlantic. Believing that it is best to obtain a knowledge of any system or set of doctrines from the persons who profess it, we have gone to the priests themselves for information about Popery, and our intercourse has assuredly enlightened us as we should not have been otherwise. We have found in them a class of men without principle, as that is understood by all the rest of the world, casuists whose entire moral sentiments with reference to all the obligations of life are completely overborne by their allegiance to the system of government and doctrine which they have in common. As long as the affairs of society continue in their usual state there is nothing marked in their conduct, and they may be good enough citizens of a Protestant or rather non-Catholic country, for Britain is in reality nothing more. But let any conflict of ideas or interests occur, hold out any prospect of success to a Papal aggression, and then all sentiments of patriotism and citizenship are thrown to the wind, and the foreign enemy, whose honours are consecrated by the Church, is preferred and intrigued for, and acted in every possible way by the men who profess to be the subjects, and who, it may be, enjoy the pay as well as the protection of the Government under which they live. Through the conduct of the priests in Ireland and elsewhere, the question of allegiance may become such that it is more than probable many persons will find it necessary to vote against what the people of this country.

Brutal Murder.

A PRINTER KILLED BY A BLOW FROM A SLUNG SHOT.

From the Indianapolis Daily Sentinel, Wednesday Nov. 23.

About four o'clock on Tuesday morning, as officers Farrel, and Schergart, of the Night Police, were on their beat, they were attracted by the heavy breathing of a man in the area of the basement of the Oriental House, on Illinois Street. They descended and discovered a man in an insensible condition, lying at the foot of the stairway. They searched around for some conveyance and found a hand cart in front of the store of Darby & Wilkins, and on this the wounded man was placed, and not knowing who he was or where else to take him, they conveyed him to the jail, where it was discovered that he had a fearful wound, crushing in his skull behind the left ear. Farrel hastened for Dr. Lynch, the county physician, who pronounced the wound fatal.—Blood was running profusely from his ear, and quite a pool was to be seen on the spot where he was found, at a late hour yesterday. The injured person was soon recognized to be William Smiley, a printer, who has been working at his business in this city for about twelve months, and at the time a hand in the Journal office. He was carried at once to his boarding house, the Kansas Saloon, where he was visited by different physicians, who all pronounced the case hopeless. Dr. Funkhouser, who examined the case with great care expressed it as his opinion that the wound was made by a blow from a slung shot, and we believe that other medical men coincide in that opinion. Every attention was paid to the dying man, by his fellow crafts-men, among whom he was an especial favorite, but without showing any other signs of life but heavy breathing and a spasmodic action of the muscles, he expired about two o'clock P. M. being his 25th birthday.

The suspicion that he had been foully dealt with caused great excitement, and active inquiries were early set on foot to trace him, if possible, to the hour at which he was found weltering in his blood. It was very evident that he had been dragged some distance, for his pants gave every evidence of it, and the flesh was ground to the bones, by the gravel, about his ankles. On examining the place where he was found the trail of a dragging body was clearly discernable along the side walk, starting from the steps of the area to Maryland Street. Crossing the street, it (the trail) was almost effaced by the passing teams and footmen, but on the sidewalk beyond it was clear again half way to Washington Street. Here it stopped. That the body was dragged south toward the area is very evident from the fact that bits of lime and other soft substances were encountered, and mashing between the brick, the marks made by them were in that direction.

That a body was dragged there can be no doubt; yet, some pretend to say that there is a doubt about its being in that direction. We examined it carefully, and find it impossible to come to any other conclusion. That he was knocked down and thrown afterwards into the place where he was found, to give the impression that he had fallen there, we do not entertain a doubt. What cause incited the fiendish crime is a mystery. A more quiet, harmless and generous fellow never lived than Smiley. He had been paid that day some $13 by the Journal Company, $6 of which he had paid for board, and it is almost incredible that he should have been murdered for the small pittance that remained. A Coroner's Jury was summoned by William Sullivan, Esq., and after hearing the testimony of a number of witnesses, the inquest adjourned to meet to-day at two o'clock, at the office of Justice Sullivan.—In the meantime the officers will endeavor to get some clue to the mystery, and the printers of the city are determined to spare neither labor nor money in their efforts to bring the guilty party or parties to justice.

Smiley was a native of New York, and has relatives residing in Montreal, Canada.

THE RIFLE MOVEMENT.

From the Glasgow Commonwealth.

A meeting of no small importance to the rifle world has been held in London. The object of the meeting was to found a national association for the encouragement of Volunteer Rifle Corps, and the promotion of rifle shooting throughout Great Britain. The meeting was attended by a most influential class, including lords, generals, admirals, officers, and volunteer officers, and as far as we are able to judge from the report, appears to have been thoroughly successful. The importance of this meeting cannot be lightly estimated. It is not enough that there should be an enrolment of volunteers. There must also be the adoption of the rifle as the national weapon of the country. Rifle shooting must be cultivated as an art, and transformed into a great national recreation, as well as adopted temporarily as a military precaution. It might safely and most advantageously supersede the horse racing, which has degenerated into a public abuse, and ought no longer to receive the public sanction. Lord Elcho and his friends have done well to bring the subject before the country in this practical way, which does not confine the encouragement to rifle corps but extends it to rifle shooting generally. Hints—apparently on good foundation—have been thrown out, that if the Association is successful, the Queen would grant prizes, and the Prince Consort would lead his co-operation. Not the least important part of the business is that the Minister of war, Mr. Sydney Herbert, is likely to accept the office of first president. Under these favouring influences there can no longer be a doubt that rifle shooting will become the national amusement of Britain, and next summer—if the rifles are not required for more serious service before that date—a grand display will take place in the neighbourhood of London. It is now a question for Scotland whether she shall form an integral part of the national association, or found an association, of her own. To a great extent rifle shooting must always be local.—It cannot, like horse-racing, be carried out by the same competitors in all parts of the country, and therefore, as Scotland might fairly wish to establish and maintain a reputation of her own, she might perhaps find it advisable to have a Scottish Association—co-operating with but independent of the association whose centre is naturally London.

Royal Visit to Canada.—The promise made by her Majesty to the Canadian deputation was to the effect that either the Prince of Wales or Prince Alfred should visit the great North American Province next summer. Excepting a rupture with some great power, there is every reason to believe that the promise will be fulfilled.—The matter has been sufficiently discussed and it is understood that the Prince will not only be present at the opening of the great parish that unites the oceans of Europe and America, but that he will remain a considerable time in Canada to test personally the attachment which all her races entertain towards her, and the glorious character of the country.

Reciprocity and the Canadian Tariff.

From the N. Y. Albion, of Dec. 3.

The Canadian journals have for some weeks past been engaged in discussing the Reciprocity Treaty and the existing Tariff. The Treaty has been brought prominently before the public, in consequence of the United States Government having caused certain enquiries to be made into its working, with the view, it is alleged by some Canadian papers, to show that the Treaty has proved detrimental to the Americans. We can discover no grounds for this allegation. But if it be true that the object of this government was to prove or to justify this foregone conclusion, it is impossible to understand how that object could be attained in the face of the pregnant statistics of the commerce of the British Provinces with these States, since the Reciprocity Treaty went into operation. In round numbers the total exports of the Provinces last year amounted to twenty-three and a half millions of dollars, against a total import of fifteen millions and three quarters.

The British Provinces are in no respects manufacturing communities. With their grain, timber, fish, and some other natural productions of less importance, they desire to purchase the manufactures, which the skill, the industry, the well managed division of labour in these States, and their geographical position, enable the American people to supply to their British neighbours. Thus the Provinces do not take in return for their natural productions the natural productions of the United States; they take only a portion of these, and therefore the balance of trade in natural productions is in favour of the Provinces. But it is not a sound objection to the Treaty that it does not cause an exact interchange of raw material. It is not in the nature of the relative condition of the two countries that it should be so, and it never could have been expected by the designers of the Treaty that it would cause such an interchange. The United States, therefore, in sending to the British Provinces natural products to the amount of somewhat less than a third of its total export thereto, and equally only to about two-fifths of the Provincial export of natural products to these States, is a result which ought to cause no surprise; it is strictly the consequence of the different age and condition of the two countries, and should give the people on either side of the frontier complete satisfaction.

But it is urged on the part of the American merchant that the new tariff of Canada, by considerably increasing the duties on important manufactures, militates against the effect of the Reciprocity Treaty, and is opposed to its spirit. It is of course true that the general tendency of increased duties is to lessen imports, other causes being equal; and it may happen that the higher tariff of the present year has tended to check the purchase of American manufactures for which the improved trade of the Province would have increased the demand. Yet when the treaty was made it was well known that the Provincial revenues were raised almost wholly by means of customs duties, and it was patent that those duties must fluctuate with the commercial activity of the Provinces. It was known that the Provinces had heavy liabilities to provide for; and it could not but have been foreseen that at any time the revenue might fail to meet those liabilities, the Provinces must have recourse to their ordinary means of increasing the revenue, that is, an increase of their tariff. Direct taxation might be resorted to, it is true; but for general purposes it has not been contemplated at any time in these States or in the Colonies; and it never could have been thought of by the framers of the Reciprocity Treaty on either side, as a means of maintaining the tariffs of the Provinces or of the Union, at the rates existing in 1855 as a standard. Besides it is only Canada that has materially altered its tariff since the reciprocal arrangement of 1855; New-Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, with their three quarters of a million of population, having maintained, or very nearly maintained, their fiscal duties as they existed five years ago. And even the Canadian tariff does not discriminate between the imports of the United States and those of other countries, Lowell is not taxed more than Manchester, or Philadelphia than Staffordshire. Imperial policy does not permit that, even if the Provinces desired it, and they have not the desire. If the tariff encourages the direct importation of goods from the place of production, Americans cannot complain of that—a marked feature of their own tariff—however unwise or objectionable others may think it.

The discussion of the treaty has led to the discussion of the Canadian tariff. We urged objections to this tariff when it was under Legislative consideration. At present we only see those objections confirmed. If this tariff has not weighed heavy on Canadian trade, it has thus far fallen short of the expectations of its promoters, in the production of revenue; it has irritated the traders of the Western Province; it has made British manufacturers uneasy, American merchants suspicious. It was a step backward in political science, a defiance with the enticing theories of protection.—If the returns of revenue at the end of the year do not excuse it, who will undertake its defence?

In the United States and England, terrible fury is made about the Maine Law, or any other law tending to restrain drunkenness and the public exhibition of the vices of the people. In France, however, it seems so natural in the interest of the public at large to suppress those evils, or, at least to keep them out of sight, that repressive laws are passed and put in operation without even exciting remark, or say nothing of opposition. The other day the Mayor of Bordeaux, having observed that lately there had been a good deal of drunkenness, in the streets, suddenly, without any notice, or any public agitation of the subject, or in fact any but the most ordinary exercise of his duty, published a decree in which he declared that hereafter any man found drunk in the streets should be arrested by the police and carried to the station house till he got sober. That then he in company with the man who sold him the liquor, should be made pay the expense of the arrest and the night's lodging. In other words the Mayor puts the drunken man on the level of a box of goods or other cumbersome and unsightly object which obstructs the pavement and is offensive to the public eye. But the beauty of this Mayor's decree is that it will be executed.

Re-interrment of Siddons.—The Washington Star says that Daniel E. Sickles appeared in his seat in the House Hall on Monday. On his re-appearance there, he was warmly greeted by the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House. "Messrs. Montgomery, Cox, and another whose countenance we did not recognize, had conversed with him ere he left the hall, after the termination of the first ballot for Speaker."

The "Press" says: Prince Edward of Saxe-Weimar, late Governor-General and Commander-in-Chief of Bermuda, and Grand Master of Freemasons, is appointed for Kent.

French Desire for War with England.

On the 20th of August last there was a dinner given at Versailles to 5,000 of the Imperial Guard. The tables were laid in orangery, and each soldier was in his place under the command of his chief. At the end of the banquet the public was allowed to mingle with the soldiers and indulge their loquacity by sharing and asking questions. One of these goes up to a Zouave, who had an enormous gash on his face, and says, "My fine fellow, you have a wound to be proud of, and it does not disfigure you, though you have lost your eye. Where were you wounded?" "At Magenta," was the answer, and we have the whole history of it. "Well, then, I suppose you have had enough of war?" proceeds the admiring civilian. "Moi, Monsieur! Si dans quatre mois, comme nous l'esperons bien, on nous mene en Angleterre, je demanderai encore a etre le premier." We have the records of many such conversations. Another Zouave astonishes the women in a railway carriage by the announcement that the French army will be at it again next spring. "We are going to England." "To England!" cries no astonished woman. "Yes madame we go to England in the spring, or a little later." "And why there?" "Dame, dame, pour nous revenger, or, pour nous revenger," cries the excited Zouave. "To revenge what?" "France and England are allies; they cannot make war." "Ah, oui, madame: I know the English well; they are good sailors; they fight well, they stand well; we esteem them, journals, which it has emboldened to sustain its profligacy, without equalling his talent.

The simple explanation of the article above quoted is that the Times has once more discovered that it cannot outrage the moral sense of the people of England with impunity. It makes the best enemies it can for its pendent, and the public will detect in the effort at self-exculpation a repentance which, without shame, might have been spared. We, as journalists, invariably avoid references of this description; nor should we thus have spoken of the prolonged manœuvrault of our agile and eccentric contemporary, but that the more logical mind of the foreigner cannot comprehend how perfectly some late demonstrations are in-theses islands, although so calculated to produce exasperation abroad.

Death of Prof. George Wilson.

From the Edinburgh Courant.

We have this day the melancholy duty to record the death of Dr. George Wilson, F.S.R.E., Professor of Technology in the University of Edinburgh, Director of the Industrial Museum of Scotland, and brother of Professor Wilson, University College, Toronto, C.W. He had entered upon the duties of the session, and had lectured for three weeks to a class of 84 pupils, being the largest number which ever attended the lectures. On Friday last, after lecturing twice, he was seized with inflammation of the lungs, under which he gradually sunk, and died on Tuesday night, about eleven o'clock. Professor Wilson had naturally a weak constitution, and a feeble frame of body, and he suffered much from sickness during his comparatively brief career. His friends were often surprised at his recovery after illnesses under which many a stronger frame might have succumbed. Amidst all these attacks of illness he maintained a buoyant and elastic spirit, and was ever ready to undertake the labors which fell to his lot. Indeed, his kind and generous disposition often caused him to take more work than he might have done; and the fatigues he endured in connection with the new museum contributed in no small degree to shorten his days. He took a peculiar interest in the subject of his chair, and treated it in a most felicitous manner. He was a most attractive lecturer. His beautiful illustrations and genial wit secured for him the most studied attention, and his graceful mind clothed with new ornament anything that he touched. He came into notice as a lecturer on chemistry, and as such he devoted much attention to its application to common life. In this way he became peculiarly fitted for the new chair of Technology, which suited his taste, and called forth his warmest efforts. He rejoiced in the prospect of the new museum being founded, and looked forward with joyful expectation to the opening of it. Alas! he was not destined to see his hope realised. He has labored, and another will enter into his labours. But what he has done will be commemorated. He has accumulated a store of materials which are fitted to illustrate all departments of industrial art. He desired to make science popular, and he succeeded admirably. His style was well calculated to attract an audience, as was evidenced by the crowds that attended his appearances in public. The Philosophical Institution benefited much by his interesting prelections on many occasions. He had a genial spirit, and entered with ardour into the socialities of life. What he displayed a truly Christian department. Science in his hands was made subservient to the best interest of his fellow men. The connection between science and religion was never forgotten by him, and he directed the minds of his pupils to a higher knowledge than that of earth. He was ready for every good work, and his writings breathe throughout a spirit of Christian philanthropy. There is in them a grace of diction, a fluency of style, and a force of illustration, which are truly remarkable. At the time of his death, he was engaged in writing the biography of his friend, Prof. Edward Forbes, whose unexpected death occurred in a similar way at the commencement of a former session. It is to be hoped that the materials are in such a state that they can be made available. Among his published works are the Life of the Hon. Henry Cavendish, forming one of the volumes of the Cavendish Society; a life of Sir Humphrey Davy; Life of Prof. John Reid, St. Andrews; Chemistry of the Stars; Chemistry of the Electric Telegraph; The Five Gateways of Knowledge; Researches on Colour Blindness; the volume on Chemistry in Chambers' Educational Course;—besides numerous pamphlets and lectures.—His sudden departure has caused a blank which will not be easily repaired, whether we look to the University and popular science to the social circle, or to the cause of religion. He has rested from his labours, and his works do follow him. So his friend, the Rev. Dr. Cairns, in the dying moments, he expressed his assured faith in the merits of his Redeemer, and his latter end was peace.

British Columbia.

AWARDS AT SAN JUAN AND VANCOUVER'S ISLAND.

St. Louis, Dec. 7.

A despatch from San Francisco, of the 14th ult. 6 p. m., via Gilroy says the Bulletin of this evening contains the following editorial remarks:—

We learn from a reliable source that General Scott upon his recent arrival in the vicinity of British Columbia, despatched a letter to the authorities of Vancouver's Island, announcing his arrival, and indicating his readiness to confer with the British authorities with a view to the peaceful solution of the San Juan difficulty.

At the last accounts, Capt. Lay, bearer of General Scott's letter, had not returned, therefore nothing was known of the spirit in which General Scott's communication was received.

Should Governor Douglas act in a spirit of firmness and moderation, there is reason to believe that the arrangements made will end the withdrawal of General Harney's troops, and the restoration of the same condition of affairs on San Juan Island, as existed previous to its occupation by the American troops.

It is not at all probable, however, that General Scott will permit Gen. Harney, or any other officer to withdraw the troops at all, it will be done ostensibly as a concession to British sensibility, with a clear understanding that such withdrawal is not to be considered as admitting a doubt as to the validity of the American title to the disputed territory; but as an act subject to it to remove matters to such a position that England may, with honor, be induced to enter into negotiations for the settlement of the boundary question.

Movements of the French at St. Pierre.

The following observations appear in our article contributed by Mr. Haliburton ("Sam Slick") to the last number of the Dublin University Magazine:

"Louis Napoleon's preparations for war are not confined to France; he has a greater military force at Martinique and Guadeloupe than we have in all our West India islands put together. He has fortified St. Pierre and Michelon, which lie between Newfoundland and Canada, contrary to the express terms of the treaty; and, under pretence of meeting at Cape Breton the French mails, conveyed by the Cunard steamers, he sends men-of-war thither, who return to those places heavily laden with coal from the Sydney mines. This is pretended to be for the use of the ships themselves, but every now and then a vessel takes a cargo on account, it is said, of the merchants there, but in reality for the Government. He has an immense store of coal there, and every vessel laden with fish that sails thence to the French West India islands I have named quietly conveys a certain portion of this fuel to form a depot there also for his Atlantic fleet.

"The Island of Cape Breton is one vast coalfield, and was conquered from the French. Its capital, Louisburg, was taken by General Wolfe. Most of the inhabitants of that country remained there after its formal cession to England, and their descendants are to this day a separate race, speaking the language of their forefathers; they are mainly occupied in the fisheries, and are excellent pilots. Their descent, their religion, their traditions, and their sympathies, naturally incline them to think favorably and kindly of their mother country; and though not actually disloyal to England, they are not unfavorably disposed towards the French. It has been observed of late, that their friendship has been systematically courted by the latter.

"The coal mines are wholly unprotected, and could be either held or rendered useless at the pleasure of the aggressor. What renders this more alarming is, that Halifax, and the whole of our squadron at that station, are entirely dependent upon these very mines for their supply of coal; so that, in six-and-thirty hours' sail from St. Pierre, one ship of war could reach Sydney, and render the English fleet utterly powerless to move from their moorings. On every foreign station, whether on the Atlantic or Pacific side of America, or in the East, the French naval force has been quietly and unostentatiously increased, so that if war were to break out they would be in the ascendant in every quarter. In these days of telegraphic communication, when news of hostility can be transmitted with the rapidity of lightning, it is not too much to say that the Emperor, by his foresight, judicious preparations, and well-concealed plans could sweep the commerce of England from the seas in six weeks."

THE GREAT ECLIPSE OF 1860.

M. Faye, in a memoir lately read before the French Academy, suggests a concert in the observations to be made by astronomers upon the great eclipse of the sun of July 18, 1860, partial over a great portion of Europe and America. M. Faye recommends the establishment of stations with some degree of regularity along the path of the total eclipse. Among many recommendations to astronomers in their observations are the study of the physical constitution of the sun; of the protuberances on the solar surface; the testing of the tables of the moon's motion; careful observations of meteorological phenomena, of magnetic variations, and the like, during the period of the eclipse. If the plan traced out by M. Faye be acted upon, it will furnish more positive information than has ever been obtained from the observation of any dozen eclipses since the world began.—Great aid can be derived from the application of photography to recording the phases of the eclipse. A number of French astronomers propose to go to Spain to observe the eclipse; among them is M. Faye. He is now preparing instruments of all kinds to be used on the expedition. It is certainly to be hoped that all this labor will not be lost by a cloudy day on the 18th of July. The readers of the Tribune will remember also the suggestion made some weeks ago, that this eclipse will offer very favorable conditions for finding the new group of asteroids which M. Leverrier has shown to exist between the sun and Mercury. The obscuration of the sun's light will render them easily visible, should any of considerable magnitude be then near the sun. Of course we cannot be sure of seeing any of them; for it may be that the new group is made up of a very great number of very small bodies, possibly too small for the vision of our keenest-sighted telescopes.—Tribune.

British Tars Astonishing the French.

The British Channel fleet only recently formed, under orders of Rear-Admiral George Elliott, left Queenstown harbor just before the recent storm, and in the midst of the most terrible hurricane which has been witnessed for twenty years, formed a line-of-battle, assisted by their steam propellors sailed up the channel, and performed a number of manœuvres, without injuring a spar, or carrying away a single sail. It is said to have astonished the French most considerably, their fleet having been compelled to take refuge in whatever ports were nearest when the hurricane came on, and the coasts were thus left entirely clear, while the English flag rode triumphant up the channel, 'in spite of wind and weather' and the greatest efforts of "rude Boreas." It need strike us after this that British tars are still British tars.

Steam on Common Roads.

Now that a British steam-carriage is in actual and regular service in the United States, while the one American steam-carriage is in such service in this or any other country; now that English machinists are supplying not only the roads of South America, India and Australia, but districts all over the world that have no roads, with traction engines; with American machines whose plans are already believed to be better, have not ceased the first liberal encouragement, when that steam vehicles are employed in the streets of London to haul loads which horses cannot conveniently draw, while their more practicable carriages with enormous venture to our strides, draw only two gentlemen of the progressive people; now that steam-engines are in the actual service of the British Government, while the contentions of our own city have refused to fasten public attention vehicle to run within. In fact; it is time for all to gladly disembark upon a candid state of the road progress and wealth. The first was the surrender of our commercial trade to the less severe ships of foreign countries.

Steam-carriages are established on various roads in Great Britain before railways were introduced, and were found of the greatest use and convenience. [illegible] brilliant promises, overcame this opposition, and superseded the common road service of both steam and horse coaches.

Steam carriages have run on our common country roads at eighteen miles per hour, up inclines steeper than one in ten, at a fair lower cost than that of horse power, without injury, or rather with positive benefit to the roads, with ease and safety, and under the most thorough and absolute control as to speed and direction, we think it would be advisable to withdraw both public and private obstacle, and to allow them a fair chance at regular service. If British mechanics and capitalist are really squandering their time and money in the business; if the locomotive is really transformed from the embodiment of power and economy to a weak and useless toy, by the simple transferring of its wheels from a plane of stone or gravel to a plane of iron, the quickest way to cure this insanity, is to give the steam carriage an unconditional carte blanche to work out its destruction. Even to double the speed upon all the present stage and omnibus lines in this country and to open them for which, such a speed would create the necessity, would give almost miraculous impulse to internal and national enterprise, trades, manufactures, production and wealth.—N. Y. Times.

THE BAPTISTS IN SCOTLAND.

The Baptist Association of Scotland held its annual meeting in the city of Glasgow. The report, after referring to the origin of the Association, mentioned that seven students had been under instruction by the tutor, and other two had been received.—It concluded with an earnest appeal on behalf of an educated and earnest ministry, and increased union and co-operation on the part of the denomination. All the other interests of this vigorous church were reported to be in a state of unprecedented prosperity. After the business meeting there was a Conference of a deeply interesting character. The subjects which engaged the attention of the Conference were, 1st, the signs of a general revival of religion; and 2nd, the duty of Christians with reference thereto; and 3rd, parental and pastoral duty in relation to the youthful portion of the community.

A NARROW ESCAPE FROM SHIPWRECK.

The steamer Bowmanville, which left here late on Saturday evening, encountered a tremendous gale, which sprang up with a suddenness almost unparallelled even upon these inner lakes. Sea after sea swept completely over her decks, and much water getting into the stoke hole, it became evident that unless something were done, she would soon go down. About seven hundred barrels of flour were accordingly thrown overboard. This lightened, an effort was made to gain Whitby; but for some reason or another, the usual light was not shown from the harbour, and the Bowmanville was thus unable to make the port. In this state of things Captain McMillan decided upon returning to Darlington. With the greatest difficulty the task was accomplished. Before they got there the fires were out, and no less than four or five feet of water in the hold. Steam there was none, and the Bowmanville was drifted into harbour by the force of the wind. The officers report that it was the most terrific gale, for a short one, they ever experienced, and Captain McMillan has done well in keeping the steamer afloat. The flour thrown overboard was insured in the North Western, and belonged to John Smith, of Hamilton, and J. Warren, Oshawa. The Bowmanville left Darlington yesterday morning for Ogdensburgh, after getting the necessary repairs.

All the facts proved in Court were proved in Parliament session before last, yet the Government not only allowed but urged Fellowes to retain his seat in the House, because his vote was thought to be necessary to keep them in power. Knowing what the Government did of the fraudulent return of Fellowes, and then urging him to keep his seat, were they not equally guilty with himself? Truly our present government are a most unprincipled set of villains. Justice has been meted out at last to Fellowes, and two of his companions; when will the Government receive their full punishment.

The stool of repentance has no cushion.

MARVELS WROUGHT WITHOUT MIRACLES.

We are told that Miracles have ceased. Possibly they may have been discontinued in order to give full scope to human intelligence. Certainly it is that the wonderful developments and achievements of science in these latter days have rendered direct supernatural interposition in human affairs unnecessary. This is especially true of the improvements in Medical Science. Two thousand years ago Thomas Holloway would probably have been deemed a worker of miracles. The cures affected by the Pills and Ointment would have been considered supernatural. Even now they are looked upon as marvels: yet we know that the medicines which have healed the sick in all parts of the world are the legitimate fruits of profound thought, unwearied study and research, and a long series of practical experiments. It is a singular fact, and one that establishes beyond question, Professor Holloway's theory of a common origin of disease, that the people of every country into which they have been introduced have considered them specially adapted to the complaints most common in such country. The reason is that they operate upon the deleterious principle in the blood of the patient, which is the immediate cause of his disorder, whatever it may be, and hence their effect is always salutary. In Canada every settler on new land who has ever tried them in intermittent or bilious remittent fever, will aver that there are no diseases in which they work such wonders as in these. The Canadians also are impressed with the belief that the cutaneous and glandular disorders to which violent extremes of heat and cold render them peculiarly subject, are more readily eradicated by the Ointment than any other disease for which it is prescribed. It is evident, however, that just what these great remedies are doing for Canada, they are doing for all nations under the sun. It so happens indeed that the ailments upon which the proprietors create the most powerful influence are precisely those which are the chief scourges of British America, and hence they seem to be, and in one sense are, more especially remedies for that region than in some other countries. But their unbounded usefulness, and the unqualified testimony of the thousands in all parts of the globe, who gratefully declare that they owe their health and even life to their use, entitle them to the confidence of all. Sold by all Druggists throughout the civilized world.

ADDRESS

TO THE ELECTORS OF THE TOWN OF PETERBORO'.

GENTLEMEN:

Having received, at the hands of a respectable number of your body, a requisition, calling upon me to be a candidate for the office of Mayor, for next year, and having accepted their nomination, I desire to bring briefly before you the grounds upon which I invite your support. You are aware that the financial position of the Town is not in the healthy state its friends would desire for it, and there are many who trace the disadvantages under which it labors to the want of prudence and economy in the gentlemen who have lately controlled the action of the Council. The first step I shall take, if you give me your confidence, shall be to ascertain as near as can be done, the actual state of the Town accounts, and after striking balances, commence as from a new date to keep your accounts, after such a manner that no difficulty may again arise to prevent the true state of every separate account being at any time ascertained. The confusion which has for some time prevailed, may have given opportunities for a freer use of the Town funds than you would sanction, and should at once be removed. The next step to be taken, is to use the strictest economy in the application of your means, to appoint no more officers than the work to be done requires; to have the town improvements, printing, and every other necessary work done by tender and contract, so as to ensure to every inhabitant the privilege of reclaiming his own outlay, and to do away with the abominable system of petty favoritism which always may be found when jobs are to be done under the superintendence of the Council. I shall also, make it my business to use every means to realize as speedily as possible all the outstanding debts due to the town, with the view of relieving in a measure our financial distress. Such a course being one of the first acts a prudent man would resort to when his affairs were an unpromising aspect.

These being the main points that now agitate the minds of the rate-payers, I do not deem it necessary at this time to trouble you with the various other matters which at the nomination and on other occasions I shall have great pleasure in discussing with you.

I remain,
gentlemen,
your obed't
humble serv't
A. SAWERS.

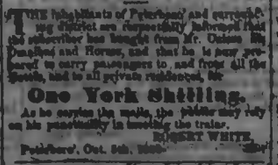
SARTLING BUT TRUE!

SURVIVOR PERISHES



HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.

The history of this great remedy is the most wonderful medical revelation that the world has ever known. It is not a history written by one man, or even derived from the experience of one nation, but consists of a compilation of testimonials from the sick of every country—a record, the like of which has never been adduced in favour of any discovery or invention since time began.

BILIOUS DISORDERS.

In whatever form disease attacks the liver, it is repelled and exterminated by this searching, painless and irresistible curative.

Let the sick whom the faculty have abandoned, accept with confidence to this nutritious agent, and a restoration to health and activity will be the unvarying result.

DYSPEPSIA.

The great scourge of this continent yields quickly to a course of these antiseptic Pills and the digestive organs are restored to their proper tone; no matter in what hideous shape this hydra of disease exhibits itself, this searching and unerring remedy disperses it from the patient's system.

GENERAL DEBILITY AND WEAKNESS.

From whatever cause, LOWNESS OF SPIRITS, and all other signs of a diseased liver, and other disorganization of the system, vanish under the eradicating influence of this all powerful antiseptic and detergent remedy.

SICKLY FEMALES

Should lose no time in trying a few doses of this regulating and renovating remedy; whatever may be their complaint, it can be taken with safety in all periods and other derangements; its effect is all but miraculous.

Holloway's Pills are the best remedy known in the world for the following diseases:

Asthma, Bowel Complaints, Coughs, Colds, Chest Diseases, Costiveness, Dyspepsia, Diarrhœa, Dropsy, Debility, Fever and Ague, Female Complaints, Headaches, Indigestion, Influenza, Inflammation, Liver Complaints, Lowness of Spirits, Piles, Stone and Gravel, Secondary Symptoms, Venereal Affections, Worms of all kinds.

. Sold at the Manufactory of Professor Holloway, 80 Maiden Lane, New York, and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicine throughout the United States and the civilized world, in boxes at 25 cents, 63 cents and $1 each.

It has (with business men generally, and especially with the best Merchants of both Provinces) become so great a favorite, that it is now acknowledged to be THE LEADING HOTEL of Montreal. To meet the extensive increase during the last year in the business of the house the proprietor has built a large addition. The Dining Room has been extended and made more commodious; there have been completed in the new wing a great number of well-ventilated sleeping rooms, and the House throughout has been refitted, and now contains many improvements and conveniences hitherto unknown to its guests. The Dying Emigrant.

BY CHARLES SWENSTER.

Lay up nearer brother, nearer,
For my limbs are growing cold,
And thy presence seemeth dearer,
When thy arms around me fold.

I am dying brother, dying,
Soon you'll pass me in your berth,
For my form will soon be lying,
'Neath the ocean's briny surf.

Hearken to me brother hearken,
I have something now to say,
Ere the cord of vision darken,
And I go from hence away.

I am going, surely going,
But my hope in God is strong,
I am willing, brother, knowing
That He doeth nothing wrong.

Tell my father when you meet him,
That in death I prayed for him,
Prayed that I might one day greet him,
In that world that's free from sin.

For my mother, God assist her,
Now that she is growing old,
Tell her I would glad have kissed her,
Ere my lips grew pale and cold.

Listen brother catch each whisper,
'Tis my wish I speak of now:
Tell, oh tell her how I missed her
When the fever burned my brow.

Listen brother, closely listen,
Don't forget a single word,
That in death my eyes did glisten,
At the thought her memory stirred.

Tell her she must kiss my children,
Like the kiss I last impressed,
Hold them as when last I held them,
Folded closely to my breast.

Give them early to their Maker,
Setting all their trust in God;
And he never will forsake them,
He has said so in his word.

Oh, my children, Heaven bless them,
They were all my life to me.
Would that I could once embrace them,
Ere I sink beneath the sea.

'Twas for them I crossed the ocean,
What my hopes were I'll not tell,
But they've gained an orphan's portion,
Yet he doeth all things well.

Tell my sister I remember
Every kind and parting word,
How my regret has been kept tender,
By the thought her memory stirred.

Tell them I ne'er reached the haven,
Where I sought the precious dust,
But here I gained a port in Heaven,
Where the gold will never rust.

Bid them to secure an entrance,
For they'll find their brother there,
Faith in Jesus, and repentance,
Will soon o'er each a chase.

Hark! I hear my Savior speaking,
'Tis, I know his voice full well
When I am gone don't be weeping,
Brother bear my last farewell.

SMYE, 1859.

A Cure for Despondency.

"Please, sir, take me over the crossing," said a little, faint voice, as I was leisurely taking my morning walk.

The strange request aroused me from my reverie, and looking imploringly in my face stood a thinly clad, shivering little girl, who carried a small bundle, which she held in her hand with singular tenderity. I gave a searching look into the little childs face while she imploringly repeated:

"Will you take me over the crossing, quick sir?. I'm in such a hurry!"

Tossing her in my arms I bounded over the muddy pathway, and just as I set down my little charge, the bundle slipped from her grasp, or rather its contents, leaving the empty paper in her hand and an embroidered vest upon the sidewalk. I picked up the vest and in doing so, unrolled the same when lining, swing-silk and padding were all disengaged, so that the nimble fingers of the poor child picked up and brushed and packed them together again with scrupulous care, and tying them firmly, she gave me a sweet smile and bounded along.—She would soon have gone from my sight had I not again called after her, and inquired her why she made such haste.

"O, sir," she replied, "because my mother must have expected me an hour ago. I have been waiting for the young gentleman at the tailor's shop to decide which colour he preferred, and then the tailor told me to stop while he cut it, and then he gave me such a beautiful pattern to embroider it by—but it's a sight of work to do it, sir, and I'm afraid she will set up all the long nights to me, while I am sleeping, for the time said he must have it completed by next Thursday; the young gentleman is to be married then, and will want it—and if it isn't done, may be he might never give me another stitch of work, and then mother would become of us?"

And on she sped bounded, as I caught the same quickening footsteps, and followed on until we came to another crossing, when up it sang the same beseeching tone:

"Will you take me over the crossing, sir?"

It was done in a trice, and my interest in the child increased as her prattle continued:

"Mamma is to have two whole dollars for the work, and she knows by the size of the vest which a part of the shading that when we shall have a great deal of money to put with we—and if there is any more work to do, I shall help her to it, and then we shall be able to live in a better house than the one we live in now, and I shall not have to run errands for the tailor, and mamma will not have to work so much, and we shall be happy."

[illegible] got such a nice job—most of the time she has to sew [illegible] shop, where she learns but about ten or twelve cents a day, and then she has hardly enough to pay her rent, and it isn't all the time we get enough to eat—but then mother always gives me the big slice when there is most meat and one little one [illegible] and that's not her's at all."

A cough was passing—the child looked toward it and remarked:

"I know the lady in that pretty carriage—she is the very one that is going to marry the young gentleman who is to wear this embroidered vest. She came to my home yesterday to get my mother to sprangle the wreath round her white satin dress; and it's just the same pattern that is to be put on the vest—but she could not do it because her eye-sight is poor and the spangles chinked so,"

My tongue was silent—could it be that these were the very articles which were to be worn at my Ellen's wedding? For did I not pay for two ounces of spangles yesterday, and what was it that vexed Ellen so, but because she could not find anybody to sew them on when she returned? She said Mrs. Taggard was almost blind.

"My little girl," said I, "is your name Taggard?"

"Yes, sir—'Gusta Taggard and we live down in Black Court. Are you going home with me?"

It was a sensible conjecture, for why else should I follow on.

"I am going to see you safely at the door and to help you over all the crossings."

"There's only one more, sir, and here it is—we live down there at No. 3, on the basement floor. Maybe you would come with the missionary some time and see us.

The child looked kindly, and in she sweetly bade "good-bye, sir." I thrust my hand in my pocket, and drew from it all the change it contained, which was a bright fifty-cent piece, and placing it in her little palm, "'Gust a Taggard" give me her heartfelt thanks, and was soon out of my sight.

An hour before, I had started from my home an invalid. I had long deliberated whether an exposure to a chilly east wind would not injure me rather than improve me. I was melancholy, too; my only daughter was about to be married—there was confusion all over the house—the event was to be celebrated in fashionable style.—Ellen's dress had cost what would have been a fortune to this poor seamstress and I mortified. But I had forgotten myself—the cough which had troubled me was no longer oppressive; I breathed quite freely and yet I had walked more briskly than I had done for months, without so much fatigue as slow motion occasioned—so that when I returned, my wife rallied me upon looking ten years younger than when I left her in the morning; and when I told her the specific lay in my walk with a little prattler and the satisfaction of having left her happier than I found her, she took the occasion to press the purchase for Ellen of a diamond brooch, assuming if the gift of fifty cents made me so much happier, and that too to a little errand street girl, what would fifty times that amount confer upon one's only daughter, upon the eve of her marriage!

I gave the diamond brooch—I paid the most extravagant bills to upholsterers, dry goods establishments, confectioners and musicians with which to enliven the great occasion, and yet I found more satisfaction in providing for the real wants of 'Gusta Taggard and her mother than in all the splendid outlay at the wedding ceremony; and it was not that it cost less which made the satisfaction, but it was that all extravagant outlays, in the very nature of things, are unsatisfactory, while ministering to the necessities of the truly needy and industrious confers its own rewards.

I have seen the glittering spangled dress—but it was made ready by some poor, fascinated sufferer, who toiled on in patient trust, and the embroidered vest was finished by the strained vision and aching head of another, who was emphatically one of "God's poor," upon whom blight nor disgrace had fallen, save by His appointment, and the diamond brooch was borne off with admiring throngs but to be envied and coveted, while the simple fifty cents bestowed upon my little street acquaintance, had introduced me to a new species of enjoyment which never sleeps in the retrospect or causes uneasiness in the prospective. I had learned to do good in many ways—by causing smiles to have new an object and aim; I pass by splendid palaces to hasten to Black Court, and thence on to get other sources of enjoyment, so that my avocations is fast leaving me by the contributions which is given to my daughter.

I am free to acknowledge that while I cheerfully pay for flannel vests, and wheelbarrow chairs, and opera hats, and jewels, and silver ware, and garments, and all the requisitions which fashion imposes, I derive far less pleasure, from surveying them, than in sitting by an as yet stiff recipient of charity, who tells me that his little sister "you gave me money to buy flannel" and "the doctor," and "Bibles," Commentaries, and lectures," and "the Tribune," a friend of the oppressed, &c. &c. &c. It was that all extravagant outlays, in the very nature of things, are unsatisfactory, while ministering to the necessities of the truly needy and industrious confers its own rewards.

A Sad Mystery Explained.

From the New Bedford Journal, Monday

Some five years since, a beautiful and accomplished young lady, whose father—a resident of Hartford county in this State, occupied a prominent position, both socially and religiously—suddenly quenched her determination to leave home, and intimated that she was anxious and willing to take care of herself. The father, who was an austere man, given very much, it is said, to severity in his family, attempted to dissuade her from the purpose, and even threatened her if she carried out her determination.—This did not effect her plans, and, with the assistance of one of her brothers, she left home, and until last summer her friends have known nothing about her whereabouts.—Some two years after her disappearance, the father was taken sick and died, leaving considerable property, a part of which was left to the absent one; but all attempts on the part of her friends to learn her place of residence was unavailing, and she was given up as dead.

A few months subsequent, however, to this effort on the part of her relatives, she made her appearance in her native village, and was kindly received by all. She remained at home a few days, taking care to receive her letters from her father, and left again without giving any information as to her place of destination. Since that time the suspicions of the family have been awakened by a report that she had been the victim of seduction by a somewhat noted teacher of music, who was formerly employed in that vicinity, and renewed efforts were made by her relatives to learn the place of her concealment; but without success. Nothing could be gained concerning her, except that she lived in the vicinity of Boston under an assumed name, until last week, when information was received that the girl in question had just died at South Boston, and her remains were subject to the demands of her friends, who immediately took measures to remove them to her native town, and also to learn the sad story connected with her death.

It appears that the winter previous to her disappearance, she made the acquaintance of the above teacher, and, being a fine musician herself, soon became intimate with him. He being represented as a single man, with very good address attached to him, and as the sequel shows, was disgraced. She was too proud to tell her trouble, and rather than submit to public disgrace, consented to leave home; as she undoubtedly supposed, to become a wife. A few months after her disappearance it appears that she became a mother, and has since lived in seclusion, at South Boston, under the name of Mrs. Hunt, wife of George Hunt, of Boston.—The villain who had accomplished her ruin, and who was at that time a clerk in that city, was a married man, and supported a wife in Massachusetts, in the vicinity of Springfield. After accomplishing her ruin he visited her seldom, until the death of her father, when knowing he had property, and supposing, of course, she was entitled to her share, he again paid her frequent visits, until he succeeded her to return home and search her money, promising then to take her to splendid homes in the vicinity where he was soon to move.

She, like a believing woman, made the journey, received her estate, and returned again to her seclusion, where he met her and received her property, promising in a few days to return and take her away, which he, of course, did not intend to do. He left her, and has scarcely visited her since. Her discomfort by one she had supposed to be true to her, operated upon her health, and ended her life in death. She had lingered for a week, hoping to see him who had betrayed her confidence, but consumption, that withering yet fatal disease, had marked her for its victim. She died on Tuesday, and on Saturday, her remains, accompanied by an interesting boy, four years of age, were brought once more to her native village.

On a few days previous to her death she called some of the members of the house where she boarded to her room, and requested them to burn all the papers in her possession, at once, in her presence, in order to prevent, if possible, any facts concerning her fate from ever reaching her friends, whom she had disgraced. This was done; and but for an old Album, which contained many goods written from her former schoolmates, with her own true name and place of residence upon the margin of the book, her history would never have been known. Her child she gave to a Catholic school in South Boston, and deceased of her body to the same parties, and the child with the name of him who had so cruelly wronged her upon last that. Her funeral was largely attended, on Saturday afternoon. He, her seducer, who has until lately resided in the vicinity, suddenly decamped a day or two since, but will doubtless be arrested, as the officers of justice are upon his track.

(From the Springfield Republican.)

We have only to add the name of the other and most criminal party to the history—it is that of Edwin W. Reed, who lives with his wife and children in West Springfield, has a place store in this city, and attends singing schools in the country towns during the winter seasons. He is well known in all parts of Massachusetts and in the northern towns of Connecticut, and though often the subject of scandalous complaints, has maintained the outward character of a gentleman and a Christian. He is, we are informed, a member of the Congregational church in West Springfield, and that has blackened his crimes by protestations to believe that were heretofore false.—Police officers were in pursuit of him on Monday with a warrant for his arrest for a felony; and if he has not been warned of the approach of his conduct, and fled, he is in prison by already in custody. He left home, we think, on Monday morning, for Hartford, under the pretence of attending court as a witness.

STARTLING BUT TRUE!
SURVIVOR OF PERSIA.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.

The history of this great remedy in the most wonderful medical revelation that the world has ever known. It is not a history written by one man, or even derived from the experiences of one nation, but consists of a compilation of testimonials from the sick of every country—a record, the like of which has never been addressed in favour of any discovery or invention since time began.

BILIOUS DISORDERS.

In whatever form disease attacks the liver, it is expelled and exterminated by the searching, painless and irresistible curative.

Let the sick whom the faculty have abandoned resort with confidence to this antibilious agent, and a restoration to health and activity will be the unvarying result.

DYSPEPSIA.

The great scourge of this continent yields quickly to a course of these antiseptic Pills and the digestive organs are restored to their proper tone; no matter in what hideous shape this hydra of diseases exhibits itself, this searching and unerring remedy disperses it from the patient's system.

GENERAL DEBILITY AND WEAKNESS.

From whatever cause, lowness or sprain, and all other signs of a diseased liver, and other disorganization of the system, vanish under the ameliorating influence of this all powerful antiseptic and detergent remedy.

SICKLY FEMALES

A handsome reward will be given to any one rendering such information as may lead to the detection of any party or parties counterfeiting the medicines or vending the same, knowing them to be spurious.

ALBION HOTEL,
MONTREAL.
L. W. BECHER, Proprietor.
IS pleasantly situated at the head of ST. PAUL STREET, amongst the largest wholesale houses in the city. It has (with business men generally, and especially with the best Merchants of both Provinces) become so great a favorite, that it is now acknowledged to be THE Business Hotel of Montreal. To meet the extensive increase, during the last year in the business of the house, the proprietor has built a large addition. The Dining Room has been extended and made more commodious; there have been completed in the new wing, a great number of well-ventilated sleeping rooms, and the House throughout has been refitted, and now contains many improvements and conveniences hitherto unknown to its guests. The whole of the beds have, at a great expense, been furnished with NEW SPRING MATTRASSES. The Proprietor expects that by continuing his personal management of the concern, THE ALBION to say the least of it, will continue to be, as it now is, the best Dollar and a half Hotel in Canada.

Selected Poetry.

She never said she loved Me.

BY RUTH.

She never said she loved me,
But I know it, oh! how well,
It shone from the depths of her azure eyes,
And haunted me like a spell.

Her voice was always gentle,
And when to me addressed,
The quivering tone in its liquid flow,
Her pure deep love expressed.

At last she said she loved me;
'Twas at the even tide,
'Twas when I took her little hand,
And won her for my bride.

And the one happy morn in May,
The fairest in my life,
They deck'd her out in snowy robes,
And she became my wife.

Two years, two fleeting years have flown,
Since she to me was given;
And now on earth I'm all alone,
For she has gone to Heaven.

Yet not alone, for at the last,
With dying tone and look,
She bade me read with earnest prayer,
God's own most holy book.

She told me that through all her life,
Had been her guide and stay,
Besought me but to follow her,
And pointed out the way.

And then I know that tho' her love
Had made my life so blest'd,
Her heart had long been fix'd above,
Where now she is at rest.

A Stone of Memorial.

In the centre of a field on the farm of Dunich, Netherton Lochaber, there is to be seen a large upright pillar of weather-bronzed-dark grey sand stone, concerning which tradition has handed down the following extraordinary story. The monolith in question stands about 7 feet above the ground, and from its abraded and weather-worn appearance, was once, doubtless, considerably higher. Its present firm and immoveable grip of the sandy soil in which it is imbedded, would indicate that there must be 4 or 5 feet of it beneath the surface, thus giving it a length over all of some 12 feet. It is visible from the highway, and must have caught the eye of every observant tourist who had occasion to pass that way. The following, as a tradition, is the history of the obelisk. Many centuries ago (I must be thus indefinite, I have been unable to fix the date with anything like certainty) the district of Lochaber and Badenoch were herded over by a powerful branch of the family of Cummin, men of dark mien and stalwart form, but neither respects probably no better or worse than their neighbors. When they first held sway in Lochaber is unknown. The probability is that it was soon after the slaughter of the "Red Comyn" by the hands of Robert the Bruce, and the "mak sicker" donor of Kirkpatrick, at the high altar of the Greyfriars' church at Dumfries. The fate of their final expulsion from our country is involved in equal obscurity; but the story of the Dunich monolith, though silent as to the when, is explicit enough as to the how and the why of that event. In these dark and semi-barbarous ages there was a custom which, by use and want, became eventually an acknowledged law, that a chief might, if so minded, in every case of marriage within his territories, in place of her legitimate husband, on his marriage night, become the sharer of the nuptial bed with the bride.—Revolting as such a custom must appear to us, and repugnant to human and divine law alike, we must remember the age and state of society at the period as some excuse for such enormities not only being committed but universally sanctioned. Add to this that it was considered in those days that the bond of union between a chief and his dependents was to be cemented by every possible means, and we can in some measure understand, though we may not excuse, a custom which made a chief, not in its philanthropic but in its most literal meaning, the father of his people—a patriarch, in short, in the primary and strictest sense of the term. That such a custom was universal, or even common, tradition saith not: but that it obtained in more than one district is, I believe, admitted by our best Seannachies. But to proceed. It seems that at this time Ballachulish was peopled by a sept of the Mackenzies [another account says they were MacMartins,] and that a marriage was to come off among them on a certain day. A few days before the celebration of the "happy event," some friends of the "young people" wended their way, as in duty bound, to Inverlochy Castle, the headquarters of the Cuimmirinach Mor or big Cumming, as he was called, their Superior, with an intimation of the approaching marriage, and a request in the usual form that he would appear for his own interests on the occasion. Cumming took the case for a few minutes ad avizandum as the lawyers say, and at last excused himself from taking advantage of his prerogative in this instance by reason of his becoming now an old man, and the long fifteen miles of indifferent road which intervened between his Castle and the scene of the approaching festivities. The deputation therefore withdrew, and bent their steps homewards. Now the Cumming, it would appear, had five sons arrived at manhood, who somehow had become acquainted with the Ballachulish man's errand to their father, and the old gentleman's refusal to accept their invitation. Revolving the matter in their minds, they at last and probably simultaneously, came to the conclusion that their honorable sire ought not to be unrepresented at the approaching marriage—that there he could not go himself, they should as his substitutes, his sturdy henchmen, or the comitadh. Circuitously they bill ed themselves with the intelligence that the old gentleman was unable to attend in person, but that he had deputed them, and he trusted they would bring with them a favorable report of the proceedings. Cheerfully they set out on their journey, and in due time arrived at the house of the bridegroom, where they were received with every mark of respect, and places of honor provided for them at the ends but hospitable board. So far well. As the evening wore on, however, the two young men explained their intentions, and made known their expectations! Solemnly and emphatically the bride and her friends—the bridegroom and his friends, protested against such a violation of the country's custom. Had the Cuimmirinach Mor himself come, he had been welcome. He had received due intimation; it was his own fault he was not there. No substitute was, on such occasions, ever before heard of—aut Cæsar aut nullus. The sons were welcome to the entertainment, as far as it had gone or might still go; but as to their proposals further, they were not, and would not be listened to. Such was the protest, and, like a celebrated one of more modern times, it was doubtless by its authors, and with reason, thought altogether "unanswerable." There was nothing for it for the Messrs. Cumming but to give up the case, and they then and there left the marriage party, with vows and threats of deadliest and swiftest vengeance for what they, no doubt, considered the unhandsome manner in which they had been treated. For sometime after their departure the marriage party took into serious consideration the position they now occupied, with respect to the Cumming vengeance breathing sons, when some one among them of a more fiery nature than his compeers, proposed that they should take the initiative in the next stages of the business, by pursuing the brothers forthwith, and, on having overtaken them, either force them to a withdrawal of all present threats and future action on the subject in dispute between them, or, in case of refusal, put them to death, the most effectual way, as it seemed to him, of putting a stop to all contemplated acts of vengeance on their part. This proposal was at once agreed to and acted upon. In hot pursuit of the brothers Cumming started the party, nor was the chase a long one. In the wood of Dunich, the young men were overtaken and after expostulations on the one side and reiterated threats on the other, dispatched with many wounds. Having gone so far, the Ballachulish men, certain of the sympathies and support of the country, thought not of retreating. "Forward!" was the cry.—Decapitating the ghastly heads with them, they pushed on to the castle of Inverlochy, rousing the country as they went, and being joined by the people, old young, male and female. At break of day appeared a large and formidable company at the gates of Inverlochy. The bolts were withdrawn by the Cuimmeinach Mor himself, all unsuspicious of danger to him or his. It was only when the gory heads of his sons were rolled at his feet that he became alive to the real state of matters. He pleaded for his life, which was granted, on condition that he would immediately leave Lochaber, never more to return. To these terms, hard as no doubt thought them, he was obliged to submit. His enemies were so generous as to allow him to carry all his goods and chattels along with him, providing him with baggage horses for the purpose. In a few hours, escorted by a body of Lochaber men the Cumming, with his family and goods, was on his road to the north; arrived in the afternoon at a hill near the south end of Lochness, still called after him Stiabh Chuimmein—he begged to be allowed to sit down and take a long last look at Lochaber. The request was granted. He looked wistfully and long behind him, till at last, under the weight of misfortunes and sorrows his heart, in the expressive language of the Gael, "burst." His body was conveyed to a green spot, by the margin of the lake below, and there buried. After him the spot was henceforth called Cile a-Chuimmein the burial place of Cumming, better known in our days as Fort Augustus. The stone at Dunich was erected on the spot where the brothers were put to death—a warning to the future to all young men prematurely ambitious of "filling their father's shoes."—Glasgow Herald.

Story of a French Political Convict!

From Sketches of Algeria during the Kabyle War.

After a few days spent in the Lazaret of Algiers, the living cargoes of the Bernadette and the Alexandre, of which I still remained a unit, were formed into bodies and marched into the interior. Six of these divisions were directed on six different points, viz: Birkadem, Douera, Bourbika, the Maison Carree, the Chiffa Troubles, and the Maison Blanche. Tents were served out to them in a given proportion, and camps were formed. Time was required to teach these men camp manners; and when the wet season came upon them they suffered dreadfully from fevers and dysentery. Unused to living under canvass, the heat at first struck them down. They knew nothing of the manner of pitching the tents, so as to preserve them from the frightful rains, and the soldiers, who regarded them as troublesome cattle, did but little to help them. Numbers died during this season of probation; and many more, standing all day on the ground saturated with wet, and sleeping at night on wet straw, laid the foundation of disease which enabled them, at a later period, to return on sick certificate to France, and die in peace.

It became necessary to find employment for the surviving exiles, whose numbers were strengthened by fresh drafts from the mother country faster than death thinned them: although Africa has favoured Canada in sending all their best to colonise there. Work was therefore provided, but on a field changed to their capabilities. The officers who had charge of the various establishments, and the engineers who had to superintend the works, were generally men who had served in the Peninsular campaigns, and who had a thorough knowledge of the character of the Spanish soldier. They knew that the best way to get the most out of him was to treat him with kindness, and to make him feel that he was not a slave, but a man. Thus the exiles were treated with every consideration, and were made to feel that they were not prisoners, but colonists. Their pay was the same as that of the soldiers, and they were allowed to purchase their own provisions, and to cook them as they pleased. Their tents were divided into messes of ten men each, and they were allowed to build huts for themselves, if they preferred it to living in tents. Their work was to cut the wood of idleness, and employment must be found for them.

Many of the exiles had followed liberal professions; many had been borne away from comfortable homes and from good society; while others had always been used to hard manual labor; but all alike were directed to work on the roads, and in draining the marshy plains. In many of the villages which had sprung up here and there on these vast plains, the population had been mowed down by fever, and renewed sometimes as many as three times. This was attributed to the want of drainage, and the inhabitants of the convict camp needed work. What better employment could be found for such troublesome cattle? Often wet through, above their knees in mud and dirt, and kept without any change of linen, the men of weaker natures suffered in silence, bearing blows and continually without complaint, until the hospital tent received them first, and afterwards the trench dug in the churchyard.

The more stubborn resisted, and ultimately refused to work. Words and blows were tried in vain. "We are sure to die" was their reply to both; "kill us then at once," and before their untameable obstinacy both blows and recrimination failed.—Some of these men were dragged, by means of ropes tied to their feet, to the places appointed as the scene of their labors, but a remnant still held out in their stern refusal, and pestered their task-masters with their continual demands for death. After every available means had been used, and had failed, these men were marched into the towns, and there consigned to prison, where after a long confinement, some gave in, and the remainder died; and when the jailor came to carry off the last relics of the fallen Republicans, he would find scratched on the prison wall, over the pallet-bed, such words as these:

Here lies ——, assassinated by Buonaparte.

Some officers commanding the camps did what they could to alleviate the sufferings of their prisoners, others behaved different in a different manner. One who signalized himself over his fellows by inhuman conduct and whose only excuse was youth and inaptitude for command, a young lieutenant of the convict camp of Douera, one day directed four men, for refusal to work, to be sent to prison. They could not leave the camp until the following day, and some of their comrades knowing nothing of the severity of martial law of military discipline and having managed to procure some bottles of wine, fêted their departure that night.—Toasts to liberty were drunk, the "Marseillaise" was sung, and, low as the chant was, it reached the ear of a neighboring sentry. The lieutenant at once interfered, struck right and left, seized on the first four delinquents, and ordered them to be put in irons. Upon this the whole party rose and petitioned the officer to allow them all to share the punishment, as they had shared the wine and the fete altogether.

Lieutenant M—— drew up a report of this occurrence, so worded as to show his own promptitude and firmness in a conspicuous light, but giving such gravity to the matter as to cause the four refractory prisoners to be brought to a court-martial; and the court presided over by a lieutenant colonel, condemned them to death on the evidence of the lieutenant.

Douera is situated at about eighteen miles from Algiers, and no sooner did the capital pumishment awarded by the court become known on the public Exchange of that place than it created a great sensation. People looked at each other in consternation, asking under what rule they lived, that drinking a toast to liberty, and singing a Republican song, was punishable with death The Bourse was closed, and small knots of people might be observed assembling here and there. The Government seemed alarmed, and it soon became rumored, was looking for a feasible mode of retreat, but the award of a court-martial cannot in France be set aside by any other tribunal.

It was necessary to do something, and the day of execution was adjourned from time to time until that something was found out. For eight months these four poor fellows lingered on in daily expectation of being led out for execution; but at last after a diligent search, a flaw was found in the proceedings of the court which had condemned them, and a second court was detailed for their trial. This court on the same evidence, and the same accusation, completely and fully acquitted the prisoners and restored them to their former position.

Other prisoners for a similar crime were dealt with subsequently on a different principle. The anniversary of the taking of the Bastile was celebrated by some of the exiles. A few bottles of wine had been carried together, and the "Marseillaise" was sung. Four men were seized and imprisoned. They remained a whole month in gaol before trial, and were then sentenced to eight days solitary confinement. The sentence seems severe enough, but the military authorities of Algiers thought otherwise. In the dead of the night, and without warning, these men were brought out of their prison, and embarked on board ship. They knew nothing of their destiny; but were eventually disembarked near Oran, and there turned loose on a vast plain, with not any means of existence, or protection against the rays of the sun. They might die, they were told in mockery by one of their guards, the "Marseillaise" there as much and as loud as they pleased. Without tents, without food, they burned by day and shivered by night, these men remained for days with roots and wild fruits, and at last succeeded by stratagem in getting to the place where they were reserved for distant exile, to Cayenne and perhaps to death.

The guilty British soldiers left in charge of the exiles, who had been the cause of their punishment, were tried by court-martial, and found guilty of having exceeded their duty in the execution of the orders which they had received. They were sentenced to be reduced to the ranks, and to undergo a certain number of lashes. The sentence was carried into effect in the presence of the whole garrison of Algiers, and the men were then sent to join their regiments in Spain.

Battle between the Spaniards and Moors.

The Spaniards were constructing a field work outside the walls of Ceuta; but the incessant attacks of the Arabs rendered its success impossible. The working party had several times been ordered to run for their lives to the entrenchment under the walls and seldom escaped without any serious casualties. General Echagne, therefore, had been supported by the Bourbon Regiment as a covering party; but the Arabs fell upon it with such fury that Echagne was obliged to bring up supports. But even with these, though numerically superior, he was beaten back with a loss of 100 killed and wounded. He himself did not escape unscathed, and his wound appears to have been sufficiently serious, as to make it necessary to go back across the Straits to Algeciras to have it dressed. The result of this is the more creditable to the Moors, from the fact that it was a fair stand-up head to head fight. They threw away their long cumbrous muskets after their first volley, and armed with their long daggers alone, they rushed upon the Spanish gunners and stabbed them at their guns; they rushed upon the lines of Spanish infantry who awaited their onset with levelled bayonets, and forced them down with the desperate energy of their charge. O'Donnell has sent up reinforcements, and the gallant Moors will doubtless be ultimately beaten by sheer superiority of numbers, but no one can help admiring their gallantry. The details I have given you above you may rely on as perfectly authentic. I perceive by a Madrid telegram, dated this day, that the Spanish Government have published a garbled account of the affair. The only point worth noticing in it is the announcement that no quarter was given or taken, and the palpable falsehood that the loss of the Moors was 500 killed and 1500 wounded. It is a well-known fact that the Moors, as all Easterns, carry off both killed and wounded. The statement is, therefore, merely a clumsy falsehood, intended to allay the excitement which the news of this reverse had created in Madrid.—From the Morning Herald's Correspondent.

MATRIMONIAL HEAL.—The quiet little village of Shirley has this week been the scene of one of the most successful and amusing matrimonial hoaxes that has been played for some considerable time. It appears that about a fortnight ago a young (!) lady about 40 years of age, who gave the name of Martha Brewer, made her appearance in Shirley, and obtained board and lodging at the house of a Mrs. Pearce, into whose good graces she was not long in insinuating herself. Soon after her arrival an announcement spread through the place that the newly-arrived was about to become a bride and she intimated to her landlady that she was to be led to the altar by a commercial traveler rejoicing in the happy name of "Green." As time wore on the rumours somewhat strengthened by the knowledge that certain confectionaries and a wedding-cake were ordered of Mr. Power, a local confectioner—that wines and groceries for the interesting event were to be furnished by Mr. Mayou—that Mr. Page was commissioned to supply rosettes, gloves and handkerchiefs to the conclave—and that Mr. Bonsed, of High Street, was preparing the wedding outfit for the bride. Thursday last was fixed as the day for the celebration, and invites were scattered with a liberal hand to such as were considered worthy a place at so notable a wedding breakfast. The tradesmen who were favoured (!) with orders and directions to send in their goods at nine o'clock on the morning of Thursday, when Mr. Green was expected to arrive and carry off her fair bride. The morning came, and about half-past nine o'clock the bride (soo-)elect called from the bottom of the stairs to her landlady, to know if she was getting up. The landlady answering from her bed-room, "Yes, Martha, I shall be down in a minute," and made all haste to clothe herself in order to prepare for the bridegroom. She was soon down stairs, but picture her chagrin and disappointment at finding her Martha gone, and with an apron and petticoat belonging to her. Without stopping to alarm the neighbours by an exposure of the flight, she made hasty pursuit after her, but without success, leaving the house locked up in her absence. Meanwhile, the attentive tradesmen, anxious to fold their commissions, appeared by their representatives one by one. The youth with the groceries was first at the door, and was soon surrounded by a heavily-laden knowing posse on a similar mission; but the more they knocked the more the door wouldn't open, and there they remained till the genteel, white-gloved and full of expectation, began to form considerable and striking additions to the group already round the door. Time wore on, and patience was nearly exhausted, when the unfortunate landlady, (who, by the bye, has not been paid for Martha's board and lodging) appeared on the spot, and struck disappointment into the hearts of those who had made up their minds to such a scene of jollity as had never been in Shirley. The tradesmen may congratulate themselves on not having delivered the goods.—Hampshire Independent.

A SAFE GLASS USED IN A CHURCH.—A sand glass for marking the time having been used in the established Church of a parish, near Perth, a gentleman residing near Dundee sent to the clergyman requesting particulars about it; and enclosed in reply the following account of its purpose and use:—"Our sand glass is a relic of antiquity. Three used to be one in every church in the olden time. Their use was to regulate the length of the long-winded sermons then in fashion. The ministers of those days were wont to favor their hearers with two hours' discourse, three in general, on occasions of more than ordinary importance. When the preacher began to run out, an elder turned the glass, and when the last sand had fallen, he knew that the sermon was drawing to a close. Then it was the duty of the precentor to rise and read a portion of a psalm, which he continued to do, verse by verse, till the preacher had turned the glass for the last time, when he gave out the last verse, and resumed his seat. The preacher then pronounced the benediction, and the congregation dispersed. Our glass is now used in the vestry, to regulate the length of the sermons of the present day, which are generally considered too short. It is capable of containing sand sufficient to run for about twenty minutes."

THE BEST CURIOUS BOOK IN THE WORLD.—Perhaps the most singular bibliographic curiosity is that which belonged to the family of the Princes de Lamb, and was in vogue in France. It is entitled—"Liber Passionis Nostri Jesu Christi, cum characteribus nulla materia compositis."—This book is neither written or printed! The whole letters of the text are cut out of cards folio upon the finest vellum; and being interleaved with blue paper, it is read as easily as the best print. The labor and patience bestowed on its completion must have been excessive, especially when the precision and minuteness of the letters are considered. The general execution in every respect, is indeed admirable, and the vellum is of the most delicate and costly kind.—Rodolphus II, of Germany, offered for it, in 1640, 11,000 ducats, which was probably equal to 60,000 at this day. The most remarkable circumstance connected with this literary treasure is, that it bears the royal arms of England, but it can not be traced to have ever been in this country.—Notes and Queries.

ALLEGED "CONVERSION" OF MR. SPURGEON.—The Unionist, the chief organ of the Tractarians, has the following curious paragraph:—"It is stated on good authority that Mr C. H. Spurgeon made about three weeks ago a formal renunciation of the extreme Calvinist tenets which he had been hitherto preaching. He said that he, and others who had taught as he had done, had been doubtless grievous stumbling blocks in the way of many pious and earnest persons, and that the only amends which lay in his power was to state publicly that he had been in error, and to guarantee that he would never propagate similar false doctrines again. It is much to be wished that the Puritans who remain within the church would emulate the candour and orthodoxy of which even an Anabaptist has shown himself thus far capable."

SAM SLICK ON THE GREAT EASTERN.—Judge Haliburton endorses the opinion expressed of the mercurious character of the Great Eastern's saloon. In his "misdirected letters" in the Constitutional Press, he introduces the following conversation:—"Dave," says I, "this is a great ship, ain't it?" "She is big enough," says he, quite cool. "Fast as the wind," says I. "Well, not unless the wind," he said, "constrain and not to be depended upon." "Take a large cargo?" "Yes, a prodigious heap of coals to feed her." "Grand space, ain't it?" "Well, yes, a large spark on the ocean, one her at a considerable distance." "She will pay well, her capacity is so great." "Perhaps so; she has more capacity than her owners, and ought to pay well, for she has done nothing but pay out yet." "Where will you see such a splendid gilt saloon as that of hern?" "Well, the House of Lords and the whitest palace are in as good taste as that is." "But isn't there a splendid cheval mirror in it?" "As an ornament to an Atlantic hotel, I approbate it first-rate; for it will make every mother's son of the passengers seasick; everything will appear to be in motion, and when she rolls they will never to be turned topsy-turvey. There is no part of the arrangement so cheap and perfect as that; their fare will cost nothing."

MARRIAGE OFFERS IN SWEDEN.—The following rather singular project has just been presented to the Chamber of Nobles of the Swedish Diet. Baron Creutz proposed that, from the age of 15, young girls should be allowed to answer at their own or no, to any suitor for their hand. M. Montgomery opposed the project, declaring that at the age of 15, love, though strong, was too blind, and that the age of 25 was indispensible to be able to see clearly on so important a question. Baron Akerscreutz treated such an objection as modern, and proposed to the Chamber to decide who was in the right, Baron Creutz or the Apostle Paul. The Baron replied that the words of the Apostle applied to paternal authority, which was very severe among the Jews and Romans, and could not now be involved when manners and customs had so much changed. Baron Akerscreutz said that if the Chamber were to adopt the project, Mormonism would become general.—Baron Creutz replied warmly that it was ridiculous to talk of Mormonism, that his project was a serious one, and calculated to have a salutary effect on manners and ideas. The project was referred to a committee.

THE EMPEROR OF THE FRENCH A LONDON DAILY PAPER PROPRIETOR.—A couple of your London contemporaries have for some time enjoyed the unenviable reputation of being more or less the organs of the French Emperor—although, with respect to one, the recent issue of its articles has led to the conclusion that the "one has executive" to the general intelligence of English journalism no longer obtains. That his Imperial Majesty, if he ever reads the other, should feel no very high degree of satisfaction at the way in which the task is done, is only natural enough. We still hesitate to believe a report which is current in some circles in Paris, that the Emperor owns newspaper properties in London, and has even assumed, and being entitled to the privileges which the proprietor and editor of a daily official, but confidential organ—one of the others. After all, it cannot be supposed that he would put his finger into the pockets of the contemptible writers who find gain in the Emperor's own newspaper, and who still delight the Metropolis established by the Second Empire.—And if they have a paper at Brussels, why not South Kensington in England? Still doubting, we think, that it is not safe to speculate in our Metropolitan newspapers being conducted on better principles than those. The salary (about thirteen pounds per week) is not to be sneezed at, and we should not, on consideration, be disposed to refuse the offer, if it were made to us. But, as we have said, we doubt the fact.—Illustrated London News.

Another Wife-Poisoning Case!

From the New York Tribune, Dec. 31.

On Sunday, Dec. 16, Coroner Haight of Dutchess County learned that Lydia Freeman, wife of Ishmael Freeman, had died under circumstances tending to throw suspicion upon her husband, and that the funeral was to take place that day. He at once ordered the husband arrested, the funeral postponed, and on the following day summoned a Jury and proceeded to investigate the case. A post mortem examination was made by Dr. Jas. E. Cooper of Poughkeepsie, in the presence of Dr. E. H. Parker, Dr. J. C. Paine, and Dr. Tuthill. The stomach and the intestines were not opened, but were sealed up in jars and forwarded to Prof. Doremus, of this city, for analysis.

The evidence taken before the Coroner went to show that the deceased was the owner of two houses and lots, and that the prisoner had executed a will making himself in case of her death, her sole legatee.

In consequence of her sudden decease, the physician who had attended her a few days, suspected foul play, called at the house after her death, with a view of making inquiries relative to her sudden demise. The prisoner unbolted the door, and seemed surprised at the unexpected appearance of the physician. He was admitted however, and conducted to a chamber in which the deceased was laying, and, on asking concerning her death, found the prisoner less communicative than usual. He said she was doing well until 3 o'clock a. m., when he gave her three oysters—one raw, and two roasted—which immediately produced nausea, followed by vomiting and purging. She complained, also, of a pain of heaviness in the region of the stomach. From that time, she continued to sink until seven a.m., of Saturday, when she "brightened up," and "seemed better." It was at this time that her will was executed.

She afterward grew worse, and died about noon.

Sylvester Chichester testified that the prisoner had purchased six cents worth of arsenic about a week previous to her death, wishing it, as he said, to kill rats. The apothecary advised him to use a "rat exterminator" in lieu of arsenic. The prisoner objected, and said he had used arsenic before, and preferred it.

Jensen Sparks [a Constable] testified that the prisoner had purchased arsenic at another store some ten days prior to the decease of the wife.

Mrs. Du Bois testified that the deceased told her about two weeks before her death, her husband had purchased some brown sugar, which was placed in a sugar-dish; that during meal time he passed the bowl to her [an unusual act of attention, for they had for some time lived unhappily]; that she put a spoonful in her cup of tea, and that it "fermented" and produced a white scum which floated upon the surface; she took a teaspoonful and it produced an unpleasant sensation of sickness at the stomach; she then threw the tea from the cup and proceeded to another room, and took some of her own white sugar, remarking that she "would see if that would serve her so." The prisoner then threw away the sugar he had purchased. The deceased also stated to the witness that this was not the first time he had served her so; that he on one occasion brought home molasses which had effected her in the same manner.

The inquest which was postponed to await the result of the chemical analysis, was resumed yesterday.

The following is Prof. Doremus's deposition:—

R. Ogden Doremus, M.D., being duly sworn, deposes and says: That he resides at No. 70 Union Place, New York; and that he is Professor of Chemistry in the New York Medical College, Professor of Chemistry in the New York College of Pharmacy, &c.; that on the afternoon of Tuesday, Dec. 20, 1859, he received from Hiram Haight, Esq., Coroner for Dutchess County, N. Y., at the hands of Robert K. Tuthill, M. D., of Poughkeepsie, N. Y., two glass bottles, corked and sealed, purporting to contain the ligated stomach and a portion of the intestines of the late Mrs. Lydia Freeman, with a written request to make a thorough examination and a chemical analysis of the stomach and intestines and of their contents, to determine whether the same contain arsenic or any other deadly poison, and also to take notice of every fact or circumstance in the appearance of said stomach and intestines that would tend to throw light upon the cause of the death of the deceased.

Deponent further says, that he conveyed said glass bottles from the private laboratory attached to his residence, to one expressly provided for chemico-legal investigations. That the seals of said bottles were found unbroken—that he removed the stomach from the glass jar in which it had been placed with alcohol, and laid it in a new and carefully-cleansed porcelain dish. That he found the stomach tied at the cardiac and pyloric extremities, that he removed one of the ligatures, and poured the contents of the stomach into a new and clean bunker glass. That said contents were of a semi-fluid consistency, presented a florid red bloody aspect, and measured 4½ fluid ounces.

Deponent further says, that the stomach was then laid open by an incision along its lesser curvature; that the whole of the interior was tinged with a bloody mucus; that on critical inspection a few white specks were seen, which were reserved for microscopical examination and chemical analysis; that the stomach was repeatedly washed with warm distilled water, which removed the general bloody appearance, and revealed large patches of inflammation toward the pyloric extremity—these of a reddened aspect running parallel with the length of the organ with abruptness, and the whole of the internal surface was softened.

Deponent further says, that the second ligature contained about an inch in front of the small intestines, the duodenum, and a portion of the jejunum, but at both extremities, and appeared to be sealed. Cut on removing one of the ligatures, about sixteen fluid drachms of a clouded fluid were obtained, having a greenish hue. Deponent further says, that the intestines were then again divided, their entire length—the intestinal canal was examined and of a pale aspect. Deponent further says, that the liquid contents of the stomach, with the washings of said organ, were submitted to chemical examination, and that the following are the results of the examination, which was performed by the deponent in the presence of Dr. Parker, Dr. Paine, and Dr. Tuthill, and that the accuracy of the analysis was tested by the presence of Dr. Cooper, of Poughkeepsie, and Dr. Beebe, of Fishkill, gentlemen of acknowledged skill in toxicology; that the contents of said bottles were found unbroken—that he removed the stomach from the glass jar in which it had been placed with alcohol, and laid it in a new and carefully-cleansed porcelain dish. That he found the stomach tied at the cardiac and pyloric extremities, that he removed one of the ligatures, and poured the contents of the stomach into a new and clean bunker glass. ALBION HOTEL,

J. W. DECKER, Proprietor.
IS pleasantly situated at the head of ST. PAUL STREET, amongst the largest wholesale houses in the city. It has (with business men generally, and especially with the best class generally, and especially those on great routes) become an great favorite, that it is now acknowledged to be THE Business Hotel of Montreal. To meet the extensive increase, during the last year in the business of the house, the proprietor has built a large addition. The Dining Room has been extended and made more commodious; there have been completed in the new wing, a great number of well-ventilated sleeping rooms; and the House throughout has been refitted, and now contains many improvements and conveniences hitherto unknown to its guests. The whole of the beds have, at a great expence, been furnished with NEW SPRING MATTRASSES. The Proprietor expects that by continuing his personal management of the concern, THE ALBION to say the least of it, will continue to be, as it now is, the best Hotel and a half Hotel in Canada.

A DIALOGUE.

Gudeman,
It's grippin' hard this day again!
Goodwife! my curlin' knee!
No! no my ribs! 'tis very like
Or mere it comes a cheer.
When I'm a rifleman, my fat
Mann be upon the green—
When hills are white, an' ice 'll bear,
I am a curler keen.

Goodwife [Who is a cankered body.]
For shame! ye fause auld feckless loon,
Ye're feart the French I trow!
A boast "defender o' the land"!
Gaun owretobie' wi' a bowe!
Where like man is mankin' oot
Practeesin' wi' the gun,
Ye'll stick awa' wi' carpet shoon,
To spare like weans at fun!

Gudeman.
You weemen folk, ye hate the ice,
An' wool it's kenned what for;
When curl-ers meet, ye never can see
Your nebs nicer's the door.
Dead gin they brither'd weemen folk—
Gin yes were nane, I vow,
I'd nivon this day my rifle, dear,
An' no my curlin bowe.

Goodwife [with a wicked sneer.]
Weel, brothers! an ye on' yeersells,
Tak guns an' mairch like men;
Auld wives an' bairns can keep the ice
An' on' shoot a stane.
Brothers! ye're coilish, cowardly knaves,
That play yeersells like weans,
An' cowess' though the French red land
An' ding oot o' our brains.

Gudeman [whose brow is fairly up now.]
Ma! hand ye there; ye're wrang noo, Mag;
Gin Frenchmen cume, ye'll see
The foremost shot by him whose stane
Lay nearest on the Tee;
The by' that on's the nicist ane o'er,
An' syne taks aff his leg,
Is first by him that nicks the best
And cannist cracks an egg.

[The Goodman is in possession of the house.]

Then 'twas that rin nae flagg'd to hear
The Frenchmen's cannon roar,
An' then's no brither'd, an' his freend,
He ne'er wan o'er the ocere!
Fa grand at makin' parts to The—
Ive practeesed at the butts;
Dibbolik' parts 'll help me best
Shake a Frenchman's guts.

[The Goodwife tries to speak, but the Gudeman man bellows.]

Gin Lyes lands when ice is knee[illegible]

We wadna' wait for rifles, Mag!
But at'ens wi' the brave.
An curlin rink wad look ten score

An' by my troth he'd lie nae hog—
We'd rookies to the ice!

[Exit the Gudeman having his kowe in triumph and leaving the Goodwife dumbfoundered—which rarely happens.]

Interior Navigation of Victoria.

FENELON FALLS, Dec. 3rd, 1859,

To John Cameron, Esq., M.P.P.

SIR,—Enclosed are plans of a new kind of lock. We call them "Flume Locks." The estimated cost of erection of locks of this description at places on the Gull River waters, which I shall presently name, is $800, if the posts and braces be of pine; if the posts and braces be of oak, each lock will cost $1,000. Enclosed are the items of the estimate.

The immense cost of lockage improvements heretofore has stood an insurmountable objection to the lockage improvement of the splendid chain of waters in the County of Victoria. Lockage improvements such as I now propose, solve the problem of the opening of the rearward navigation of the Queen County; they would cost but little more than the cost of formal proclamation formal surveys for such works. Central Canada is the only large tract fit for settlement from the Atlantic to the Island of St. Joseph and the Red River, and to render our chain of waters fit for navigation of craft larger than the canoe—the only water penetrain of Central Canada is certainly a work perhaps the most important that could engage the attention of those departments of the Government whose especial care it is to facilitate the settlement of our vacant lands, and the development of the social and commercial interests of our country. The highway that God has made to the vast and fertile wilderness of Central Canada runs northward through Victoria. Her interests, which, perhaps, more than any other County in these Provinces, are more provincial than local—her interests receive from you the utmost attention, and it is with pleasure that I forward these enclosures, feeling assured that the humblest effort possesses your sympathy, and that all will be done that can be done to bring the subject of which I now write before official notice.

The following is the plan of our rearward improvements:—

A Lock at Rosedale	$1000
Do at Cobconnk	1000
Two Locks at Turtle Cascades, (McLaughlin's Mill)	2000
(These two Locks make still water water of the natural dam.)
Two Locks at Elliott's Falls	2000
(These two locks make still water of Moore Falls, and back Gull Lake up to the Mountain Portage)
For the construction of Dams, and a few pounds of "Flume" cassilling	2000
	$8000

These places, Rosedale, Cobconnk, Turtle Cascades and Elliott's Falls, are fitted by nature for the construction of "Flume Locks." The back water, from the high banks peculiar to all our rivers and lakes above Sturgeon Lake, would not inundate over one thousand acres.

$8000 would admit the passage of a steam saw (for which I have received terms for stock to the amount of $1000 and $2000 will build it) to the Mountain Portage, five miles above Gull River bridge on the Bobcaygeon Colonization Road.

The chain of navigation above Fenelon Falls from the Falls to the Mountain Portage, [illegible]

[illegible]

Equal to [illegible]

Rice Lake would stand among the steamer ports within three miles of Bobcaygeon road at the northern boundaries of Galway and Eastnillion, and the south of Snowden and the south-east of Lutterworth. This could be done for $2000. Messrs. Wallis and Donaldson spent $6000 in attempts to make Burnt River navigable past the "Floodwood." The improvements admitted the passage of spars and saw-logs only for one season. The next summer low waters carved in the banks, they being of sand, and closed up the channel as much as it was before. The clearing out of the "Flood-wood" or the opening of a permanent channel through it, is a herculean task. Let it remain where it is, and cut a new channel for the river across the foot of the point formed by the bend around which the "Flood-wood" is jammed. The point is but a sand-bank, and as the volume of the freshets of Burnt River is very large, all that would be required would be but to cut a drain of not over 300 yards to allow the river to open for itself a channel. Two objects would be attained by this course—the "Flood-wood" would be evaded, and the channel of the river would be made straight.

Mountain Portage, the Portage between Gull River and the Mountain Lake, is two miles less six rods. A tram-road across it, at a cost of about $2000 would connect with the Gull River chain of navigation the following chains of navigable waters on whose shores the best and largest tracts of our back country farming lands are situated. I might here say that Mountain Lake and Twelve-mile lake are connected by a rapid which a mill-dam at Horse-shoe Falls will make still water. Horse-shoe falls is about to be "located" by the Department as a mill privilege and will be built upon at once, so that this dam, like those of Elliot's Falls, and Turtle's Cascades, will be built by private means. Mountain lake, Twelve-mile Lake, Little Bushkoot, Big Bushkoot, Beech Lake, Maple Lake, Grass Lake, Round Lake, East Branch, 24 miles; Big Bushkoot, Hall Lake, North Branch, 16 miles; Big Bushkoot, into Lake Kashagawigamog, West Branch, 15 miles, equalling in all, 55 miles.

I am told that at high water Mountain Lake finds an escapement to the Gull river waters, at the south end of the Mountain Portage, through a marsh to the east of the Portage. If this is the case, there will be no difficulty in cutting a "Flume Canal" through the Portage, thus connecting the above 55 miles of navigation with the 55 miles of navigation between Fenelon Falls and the south end of the Mountain Portage.

I might here speak of the Big Kashagawigamog waters. Improvements on the Portage to them would be over twenty miles to the above stretches of navigation. Bath-lake Portage, the portage to the Big Kashagawigamog waters, runs in an easterly direction from Gull River at the Mountain Portage, and it is about two miles in length. Bath Lake is about the centre of the Portage. A tram-road over the portage could be built along either bank of the lake by diverging from the present track, a little to either hand, or the lake could be bridged between two points which run toward each other from the shore. The tram-road would be an expensive structure—the most expensive of all our rearward improvements.—However, at most it would not cost over $5000. Kashagawigamog is an Indian name, and means "long narrow waters," a good description of the lake. They extend over twenty miles in a north-easterly direction, and on their banks is a large tract of arrable land, which, within eighteen months is already well settled. They are the head waters of Burnt River. Between the lake and the navigable part of the river debouching on Cameron's Lake, there are many miles of a succession of rapids and falls, through a country abounding in pine, hitherto untouched, because of the obstruction of the "Flood-wood." These rapids and falls afford many first-class water privileges. Only one mill, a saw-mill, is built upon the river. It is near the Bobcaygeon Road, and is within four miles of the head of the lower navigation.

From Fenelon Falls to Mountain Portage, 55 miles of navigation..$8000
Tram-road over Mountain Portage connecting 55 miles of upper navigation with that of Gull river. 2000
Tram-road to Kashagawigamog, connecting 20 miles of navigation with that of Gull River..... 5000
Improvements of Burnt River..... 2000
$17,000

$17,000 would open the navigation of 130 miles of country of good arrable land abounding in water power and merchantable timber; and better than all penetrating into the heart of Central Canada—a tract of country to which the lumber and settlement enterprise of the provinces are directed, it, as I said, before, the only tract fit for settlement from the Atlantic to the Island of St. Joseph and the Red River.

The above plan of rearward improvements accomplished, Victoria will possess a chain of navigable waters connected by any county in the Provinces for extent of navigable beauty and for vastness of local resources. Canada West in the Queen Province of British America, perhaps of the Empire, and the accomplishment of the improvements would give Victoria unequalled claims to the loyal and honorable title of Queen County. These improvements will be secured at an outgoing by a class of persons, who in their generations, while laying their hand at the former, who gives [illegible] attention to his maxims long as to [illegible] and obtaineth his fully by the [illegible] his hest wheat as much—they will [illegible] passed as impossible by a class of [illegible] with whom nothing can succeed which [illegible] themselves do not originate—and [illegible] me, will be "cussed" against as [illegible] by certain lukewarm, because Port Hope and Lindsay are the places on the road the Grand Trunk shall likely to be benefitted by the trade of Central Canada—Cobourg and Port Hope are not frontier towns, and to railroad enterprises, it does not afford much first-class water privileges. Only one mill, a saw-mill, is built upon the river. It is near the Bobcaygeon Road, and is within four miles of the head of the lower navigation.

The Lawrence Catastrophe.

We sought yesterday to express briefly our sympathy with the bereaved and suffering people of Lawrence, and to indicate the duty of the public in the premises. We have since received the following letter from Mr. Abbott Lawrence, which we publish in full, as it will be read with interest by all our readers. It is a model of what such a letter should be, and we are sure that the generous response which it invites will not be wanting:

BOSTON, Jan. 3rd, 1860.

DEAR SIR:—As a guide and a warning to travellers and visitors to Quebec, I wish to perform the following little ball, which I have the day paid under protest.—Detention Hotel, Quebec, 2nd Jan., 1860.—Gentlemen's Fare, to H. O'Neil, Dr. To 31 dinners 1/6ce, to H. O'Neil, Dr. To 31 days Board for self and two ladies, with servants, per agreement, $372 50 Board of servants, 93 75 Passenger ship passage to Montreal, $75; steerage, $37 50 Board of servants, $9 37½ Total $483 50. Your obedient servant, [$15; bar bill, $32—$48.50; dinner on Sunday at five o'clock, charged extra, $15; bar bill, $32—$47 50 Board of servants, $9 37½ Total $483 50. Your obedient servant, JOHN TOM PEARSE.

(The Quebecers are ostensibly making hay while the sun shines.)

PETERSBURG, ARMS Co., VIRGINIA.—The Petersburg Express says the yeomanry of Dinwiddie county, Virginia, have passed resolutions to volunteer their services to the Governor, to suppress any insurrection that may occur in the county.

—The Chesterfield Courthouse fire was the work of incendiaries. Two persons have been arrested on suspicion.

☞ Since the opening of the Victoria Bridge, the directors of the Grand Trunk Railway seem to have an eye single to the carrying of large quantities of freight through from Canada to Portland, at the greatest possible speed. As the following letter addressed to the editor of the Globe, will show this has been done at the expense of neglecting the important, but perhaps, established local trade of Belleville :—

To the Editor of the Globe.

SIR,—We have just observed an extract from a Cincinnati paper, to the effect that the road above mentioned is making desperate efforts to complete with the U. S. Railroads, by carrying freight through from St. Louis, &c., to the seaboard at extraordinarily low rates. As it is but right that persons inclined to make freight contracts with the road should know the treatment which their goods may receive in course of transit we trust that you will give place in your paper to a few remarks on the subject.—We have frequently had occasion to get goods from Chicago, and cannot, at the moment, recollect any instance where they did not arrive with comparative regularity, until the Grand Trunk began to contract for freight directly from that city. When one road contracted to forward through, we certainly had a right to expect that we should receive our goods with greater regularity. What is the fact? Instead of receiving them regularly, we can't get them at all! One car load of stuff consigned to us towards the end of November, has never been heard of by us since it left Chicago. Again, in the beginning of December, another lot of goods was shipped at that city for us. These also have shared the same fate; and although we have written both to the General Manager and the Goods Manager, and ultimately placed the matter in the hands of a Solicitor, we have obtained no satisfaction whatever.

We mention these cases specially, because they affect us individually; but they are by no means exceptional cases. They are only two instances (out of many) of the disgraceful management of the road.

At the present time, whilst goods are accumulating at all the stations on the line, with the chance of lying there for weeks, the Managers of the Road are evidently too much engaged in a reckless rivalry with American lines to make any provision for forwarding local freight. And "the great Canadian highway," for which Canada has paid so heavily in, as at present managed, comparatively useless to the country—comparatively useless because freight could often be more quickly forwarded by horse conveyance than by the Grand Trunk.—Yet, while this is the position of the road with regard to local and remunerative freight and while the officials of the Company allege that the delay is "unavoidable," they are making desperate efforts to secure freight from the Western States to the seaboard at unremunerative rates. Whether such through freight will be duly forwarded remains to be seen. It will, however, be well for intending shippers to bear in mind that the chances are that—occasionally at least (judging from the treatment which other goods receive—it may be six months before goods from St. Louis reach Portland. Meantime, if the officials of the Company fail to improve their management, shippers and consignees will have to teach them the duties and legal liabilities of general carriers in a somewhat expensive way.

Yours, &c.,
OGILVY & HOOD.

Peterboro, 9th Jan., 1860.

A COOL SWINDLE!

LETTER FROM AN ABSCONDING BANKER.

From the Detroit Advertiser.

The Corunna Banker, Wallace, who had "financial operations" with some of our Brokers a few weeks ago, has been writing letters to some of his Corunna friends. It seems, by the explanation he gives, that his object was not merely "to put money in his own purse," but to "swindle the Abolitionists," in order to pay off an old score against them which he had inherited from his father.

It seems that Wallace wrote to a gentleman at Corunna giving the numbers which would open the combination lock of his safe. When it was unlocked, it was found to contain only the covers of his books, every paper of value and all his accounts having been carried off or destroyed.

The letter to the editor of the Courier, whose commercial reports he had been in the habit of furnishing, is as follows:

{ WASHINGTON, D. C.,
{ Dec., 14, 1859.

MR. PULLIN:—You will, perhaps, think I have effrontery enough to make a jackass but suppose you do, what do I care? You are already mightily impressed with the belief that I will do some things as well as others, and therefore you may not be astonished at this.

As you no doubt had to give me a "puff" since I left, I will only say that you have my full permission—advertise me to the amount of fifty dollars I subscribed to your paper. In the same postage with this, I enclose one hundred and fifty dollars for Miss Elizabeth Slater, money that she deposited with me for safe (?) keeping.

As some who once had confidence in what I said, may still suppose that I was born and bred in New York, I will take this occasion to say that I never was in that city till July 14, 1858.

If any of your citizens suppose they have any chance of finding me in New York, I may as well say that it is rather uncertain. I am a native of a Southern State, and my father having been swindled by Abolitionists I determined to swindle somebody in the first Abolition State where I could get an opportunity, and I have succeeded in more fashion than in your own.

My operations now amount to over eight thousand dollars, clear of expenses, and which I consider puts me about even with the ——— Abolitionists. Don't understand me as saying that circumstances have contributed my dishonest actions altogether, for they have not. I have had to do so many days' canvassing, but have acted as I have thought for myself and a great deal because I wanted to.

I shall remain one of your well wishers [illegible] and if you will favor me with a line [illegible] I will write you again. I have no other object in view in writing this letter than to [illegible] I am [illegible] and [illegible] I am [illegible] I am [illegible] I am

FIXED FACTS in AGRICULTURE.

Everybody has made up his fallacy, the of "fixed facts" in agriculture. Though only selected for the Electoral College, many of the facts are of general application:

1. All lands on which clover or the other grasses are sown, must either have lime on them naturally, or that mineral must be artificially supplied. It matters but little whether it be supplied in the form of stone-lime, oyster-lime or marl.

2. All permanent improvement of lands must look to lime as its basis.

3. Lands which have long been in culture, will be benefitted by application of phosphate of lime, and it is unimportant whether the deficiency be supplied in the form of bone dust, guano, native phosphate of lime, composts of flesh, ashes or that of oyster-shell lime—or marl—if the land needs it.

4. No lands can be preserved in a high state of fertility unless clover and the grasses are cultivated in the course of rotation.

5. Mould is indispensible to every soil, and a healthy supply alone can be preserved through the cultivation of clover and the grasses, the turning in of green crops, or by the application of composts, rich in the elements of the best mould.

6. All highly concentrated animal manures are increased in value, and their benefits produced by admixture with plaster, salt or pulverized charcoal.

7. Deep ploughing improves the productive powers of every variety of soil that is not wet.

8. Sub-soiling ground land, that is, land that is not wet, is eminently conducive to increased production.

9. All wet lands should be drained.

10. All grain crops should be harvested before the grain is thoroughly ripe.

12. Clover, as well as the grasses intended for hay, mowed when in full blossom.

12. Sandy lands can be most effectually improved by clay. When such lands require liming, the lime or marl is most beneficially applied when made into a compost with clay. In slacking lime, milkbrime is better than water.

13. The chopping or grinding grain to be fed to stock, operates as a saving of at least twenty five per cent.

14. Draining of wet lands and marshes adds to their value, by making them produce more, and by improving the health of the neighborhoods.

15. To manure or lime wet lands, is to throw manure, lime and labor a way.

16. Shallow ploughing operates to impoverish the soil, while it decreases the production.

17. By stabling and shedding stock during the winter, a saving of one-fourth of the food may be effected; that is, one fourth less will answer. than when the stock is exposed to the inclemencies of the weather.

18. A bushel of plaster, per acre, scattered broadcast over clover, will add one hundred per cent to its value.

19. Periodical applications of ashes tends to keep up the integrants of the soil by supplying most, if not all of the organic substance.

20. Thorough preparation of land is absolutely necessary to the successful and luxuriant growth of crops.

21. Abundant crops cannot be grown for a succession of years, unless care is taken to provide an equivalent for the substance carried off the land in the land products grown thereon.

22. To preserve meadows in their productiveness it is necessary to harrow them every second autumn, applying topdressing and roll them.

23. All stiff clays are benefitted by fall and winter ploughing, but should never be ploughed when wet. If at such ploughings the furrow be materially deepened, lime marl or ashes should be applied.

24. Full complement of tools and implements of husbandry are intimately connected with the success of the farmer.

PHONOGRAPHY,
OR
WRITING BY SOUND!!

PHONOGRAPHY was invented by ISAAC PITMAN, of Bath, England, in the year 1837. It is the most simple, most natural, most rapid, and most easily learned system of writing which has ever been, or ever can be invented.

During the past fifteen years, hundreds of thousands of persons, in England and America, in both public and private life, have learned to write Phonography, and thousands of social and business letters annually pass through the post office.

Nor is the great popularity to be wondered at. The present system of writing is exceedingly cumbersome, and totally unworthy these days of progress and invention. Phonography is equally as legible, can be learned in one twentieth the time, and can be written six times as fast! In other words, the labor of six days can be performed in one—one man can do the work of six. So simple is the system, too, that a person may learn to write it slowly, in a couple of hours. An hour's daily practice for a few weeks will enable any person to write Phonography with certainty, and with some degree of freedom. The same amount of practice continued for six months will enable a person to take reports of speeches lectures, sermons, or conversation, and to read them with accuracy.

The late Hon. Thos. H. Benton, upon being presented with a verbatim report of one of his masterly speeches, taken by a little boy only twelve years of age, said: "Had this art been known 40 years ago it would have saved me 20 years hard labor." The learned senator spoke but a portion of the truth. What long-hand requires six years to accomplish, Phonography will perform in one.

To clergymen, Editors, Physicians, Lawyers, Secretaries, Conveyancers, Law and Medical Students, Lecturers, Printers, School Teachers, Merchants, School Boys and Girls, a knowledge of Phonography is of vast utility. In fact there is no profession or calling in which it is not useful, and no young man's education can be considered complete without it.

During the past 9 months hundreds of persons in Canada, of every pursuit in life, have acquired the Art, from many of whom the subscriber has received neatly-written phonographic letters, expressive of their delight with the attainment, and the extraordinary ease with which they have acquired it.

For the purpose of aiding in the dissemination of so important a reform in his own country, the subscriber is now prepared to supply all who apply, with the MANUAL OF PHONOGRAPHY, and the PHONOGRAPHIC COPY BOOK, sent by mail to any part of the Province, postage pre-paid, for the small sum of ONE DOLLAR.

Anybody and everybody, who can learn anything, can learn PHONOGRAPHY from the MANUAL without other assistance. Those who wish to be able to put their thoughts to paper at the rate of from 100 to 250 words per minute, should send for the above-mentioned works at once. The instruction given by the Manual is as plain as A. B. C., and ten times as easy to understand.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.

The history of this great remedy is the most wonderful medical revelation that the world has ever known. It is not a history written by one man, or even derived from the experience of one nation, but consists of a compilation of testimonials from the sick of every country—a record, the like of which has never been addressed in favour of any discovery or invention since time began.

BILIOUS DISORDERS.

In whatever form disease attacks the liver, it is repelled and exterminated by this searching, painless and irresistible curative.

Let the sick whom the faculty have abandoned resort with confidence to this antibilious agent, and a restoration to health and activity will be the unvarying result.

DYSPEPSIA.

The great scourge of this continent yields quickly to a course of these antiseptic Pills and the digestive organs are restored to their proper tone; no matter in what hideous shape this hydra of disease exhibits itself, this searching and unerring remedy disperses it from the patient's system.

GENERAL DEBILITY AND WEAKNESS.

From whatever cause, luxurious or unsure, and all other signs of a diseased liver, and other disorganization of the system, vanish under the eradicating influence of this all powerful antiseptic and detergent remedy.

SCROFULA, ERYSIPLAS, AND SALT RHEUM, ERUPTIONS OF THE SKIN, PILES, AND FESTULA,

No remedy has ever done so much for the cure of diseases of the Skin, whatever form they may assume, as this Ointment. No case of Salt Rheum, Scurvy, Sore Heads, Scrofula or Erysipelas, can long withstand its influence.

BAD LEGS, OLD SORES, ULCERS, &c.

Cases of many years standing that have pertinaciously refused to yield to any other remedy or treatment, have invariably succumbed to a few applications of this powerful agnent.

Arising from a bad state of the blood or chronic disease, are eradicated, and a clear and transparent surface regained by the restorative action of this Ointment. It surpasses many of the cosmetics and other toilet appliances in its power to dispel rashes and other disfigurements of the face.

Every form and feature of these prevalent and stubborn disorders is eradicated locally and entirely by the use of this emollient; warm fomentations should precede his applications. Its healthy qualities will be found to be thorough and invariable.

Both the Ointment and Pills will be used in the following cases:

Bunions,	Skin Diseases,
Burns,	Swelled Glands,
Chapped Hands,	Sore Legs,
Chilblains,	Sore Breasts,
Fistula,	Sore Heads
Gout,	Sore Throats,
Lumbago,	Sores of all kinds,
Mercurial Eruptions,	Sprains,

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.

CONSOLATION FOR THE SUFFERING.

Nearly fifty years continual use in every part of the habitable globe, amongst the savage and the civilized alike, has proved that simple eruptions, open sores, hard tumors, scrofulous developments of all kinds, abscesses, cancers, old wounds, and, in one word, every species of inflammation and suppuration, whether in the skin, the flesh, the glands, or among the muscles, can be arrested and permanently cured, without danger, by rubbing in and using as a dressing, this inestimable Ointment.

SCROFULA, ERYSIPLAS, AND SALT RHEUM, ERUPTIONS OF THE SKIN, PILES, AND FESTULA,

No remedy has ever done so much for the cure of diseases of the Skin, whatever form they may assume, as this Ointment. No case of Salt Rheum, Scurvy, Sore Heads, Scrofula or Erysipelas, can long withstand its influence.

BAD LEGS, OLD SORES, ULCERS, &c.

Cases of many years standing that have pertinaciously refused to yield to any other remedy or treatment, have invariably succumbed to a few applications of this powerful agnent.

Arising from a bad state of the blood or chronic disease, are eradicated, and a clear and transparent surface regained by the restorative action of this Ointment. It surpasses many of the cosmetics and other toilet appliances in its power to dispel rashes and other disfigurements of the face.

Every form and feature of these prevalent and stubborn disorders is eradicated locally and entirely by the use of this emollient; warm fomentations should precede his applications. Its healthy qualities will be found to be thorough and invariable.

Both the Ointment and Pills will be used in the following cases:

Bunions,	Skin Diseases,
Burns,	Swelled Glands,
Chapped Hands,	Sore Legs,
Chilblains,	Sore Breasts,
Fistula,	Sore Heads
Gout,	Sore Throats,
Lumbago,	Sores of all kinds,
Mercurial Eruptions,	Sprains,
Piles,	Stiff Joints,
Rheumatism,	Tetter,
Ringworm,	Ulcers,
Salt Rheum,	Venereal Sores,
Scalds,	Wounds of all kinds.

☞ CAUTION!—None are genuine unless the words "Holloway, New York and London," are discernible as a Water-mark in every leaf of the book of directions around each pot or box; the same may be plainly seen by holding the leaf to the light. A handsome reward will be given to any one rendering such information as may lead to the detection of any party or parties counterfeiting or vending the same, knowing them to be spurious.

The Dining Room has been extended and made more commodious; there have been completed in the new wing, a great number of well-ventilated sleeping rooms, and the House throughout has been refitted, and now contains many improvements and conveniences hitherto unknown to its guests. The whole of the beds have, at a great expence, been furnished with NEW SPRING MATTRASSES. The Proprietor expects that by continuing his personal management of the concern, THE ALBION to say the least of it, will continue to be, as it now is, the best Dollar and a half Hotel in Canada.

Selected Poetry.

MARY FITZGIBBON.

BY JAMES MCCARROLL.

Charmin Kitty Fitzgibbon sat inside the door,
And, begorra, I b'lieve she was knittin,
Till a moonbeam she spied playing tricks on the floor,
Quite convaynient to where she was sittin.

There it danced at her feet, in clear, silvery waves
Where some frollicksome shadows were singin;
For it streamed through the window mixed up with some laves
That the red gold of autumn was tingin.

And now, as it fell from the pure, starry skies,
And concealed in the shade half its flashes,
It appeared like the light of her own liquid eyes
Crouched within the soft lair of their lashes.

And she thought, as she gazed on the quivering flame
That herself was the one could dissimulate,
For she felt that if young Padey Casy then came,
That she wouldn't be in such a thrimble.

And besides that she said, while she looked very coy,
Though her cheek glowed as red as red ribbon,
"Sure it's nothin to me, for I scarce know the boy"—
So she did—that same Kitty Fitzgibbon.

But one half of her face was thrown out by the light;
And 'twas well that the moon had discretion,
For to give one the whole, could be further outright,
And be awkward when caught at confession.

Although fit for an altar piece, just as she was,
'Twould be ticklish, I'm sure to adore her;
For when goin your "rounds" you'd be likely to pause
Something longer than decent before her.

But now a light footstep draws rapidly near;
And she hears but her heart and it only;
Tell a full, mellow voice whispers low in her ear
"Kitty darlin I thought you'd be lonely."

Then, wilder she thrimbled than thrimbled the light;
As she said that she thought 'twas her mother;
And murmured, half out, that 'twas now after night,
And they didn't know much of each other.

But strange! after sitting an hour by her side,
While his tongue flowed in strains rich and racy,
When he got up to go, she unconsciously cried,
"Ah! then sure it's not late Mr. Casey."

Toronto, January, 1860.

LAST NIGHT OF JIMMY GRAY.

the Quaker family.

"What does thee want, poor child?" asked a kind voice at a bedroom window.

"Oh, come quick to our house!" cried the shivering child. "I am afraid my poor mother is dead."

"Where does thee live?" said the kind woman. "Mother," replied Jacob, 'it is the child of Jimmy Gray, whom we met in the wood."

"Oh, come quick!" she cried, and in a moment was out of sight. Jacob and John started with a lantern, and followed the tracks of her bare feet in the snow.

They were also guided by the yells of the maniac, which arose above the voice of the storm.

"It is not safe, John, to go in," said Jacob. "Reason has no power on a madman and I see he has an axe swinging it like a tempest through the room."

"Father," said the gentle child, "won't you give me the axe, to cut a little wood?" His furious arm relaxed; he dropped the axe to the floor, and gave it to his child. She split some shavings from a board, and kindled a fire with the remnants of demolished furniture.

As the light flashed upon the bloody form of the woman, Mary fell upon her knees trying to embrace the mangled corpse.—The axe had cut horizontally across the eyes, bursting them from their sockets, and nearly severing the head from the face.

"The poor child was inconsolate, when told that her mother must be there in cell her filth till the coroner came. Jimmy was now in a convulsion fit on the floor.

A physician was called but in vain; his last spasm was upon him, his jaws were set, and the iron hand of death was upon his vitals.

"This is horrible, Mr. Page," said the doctor.

"Yes, doctor, it is horrible," replied Jacob.

"But no one is in fault but themselves," said the doctor.

"I cannot agree with thee, doctor," replied Jacob Page. "I have known Jimmy Gray for twenty years. He was my schoolfellow in Ireland. A finer fellow never crossed the Atlantic. Intelligent, generous, and social, no one knew him without loving him.

"And that wretched woman was a beautiful, light-hearted girl, pure as the rose. I have seen all the steps of their downward way with the exception of a few weeks past I did not know their extreme degradation until this night, as I have been absent a month. Poor Jimmy has spent many hours in talking with me on this important subject.

"He has watched every step in the temperance movement in Michigan, with no interest more intense than you or I could feel unless we truly love our neighbour as ourselves. I have often mingled my tears with his, and joined him in praying for divine aid. His appetite seemed unconquerable. Nothing short of a miracle could save him in the midst of temptation.

"I laboured hard to induce the leaders of the new political party in its organization to put prohibitory law in their platforms, but I labored in vain. All shook the sceptre of quality. - Petty chiefs can easily help our numerous friends obtaining [illegible]

[illegible] are winked at, and even fawned around, for the influence they can bring to the party.

"Temperance laws are passed without heart, modified and fangled in judicial decisions, then modified again, until distillers, venders, and drinkers, are amazed that there is no serious design to stop this horrid work of death.

"Politicians want power, and having got the ascendency, they are resolved to keep it; and too much like the wicked party which they oppose, they will sacrifice and compromise principle to almost any extent, for success.

"Scenes like this are every day liable to take place; wretched men, like Jimmy Gray, are every day looking in vain for help. The flood of destruction is carrying them away, until no man cares for their souls.

"Starving children stare these politicians in the face—wretched women cry for help but all in vain. The destroyer favors political party, and he is let alone in the horrid work of plundering his victims, and pursuing them to the verge of perdition.

"No picture of woe is sufficient to bring the golden spectacles from the eyes of office loving men, or the cigars from their mouths"

"Why," said the doctor, "are you so severe on the dominant party? Is it worse than the other?"

"No," replied Jacob. "I hope not so bad; but it has the power in its hands, and starvation and woe call on it in vain to chain the destroying hand."

The wind died away, the clouds slowly sunk in the horizon, and the sun was just sending its first golden beams on the frosted trees, when Jimmy Gray ceased to breathe. He had shown no sings of consciousness since he fell to the floor. The coroner now arrived, and Mary's mother was lifted from her bloody bed. It was Sabbath morning, and Bates, the reviler, who had transferred nearly all to himself which Jimmy Gray owned five years ago, was walking to church with a splendidly dressed lady, and Louise, whose notes from the piano Mary heard last night, when he was asked by one who passed him in front of the church "Have you heard of the death of Jimmy Gray?" "A worthless fellow," said Bates "no loss to the world."— N. W. Christian Advocate.

WHIP AND SPUR.

The appliances of horsemanship have been the subject of the deepest investigation.—Beckman ferreted out all the little germs. Lipsius Pitiscus, Salmasius, Vossius, Polydore, Montfaucon, LeBeau, and Beranger, illustrative of the manner in which the ancients mounted their horses, and maintained their seats when mounted. He found that no stirrups are observable in ancient coins, statutes, or sculptures; that it was part of the duty of the local magistracy, both in Greece and Rome, to provide convenient stepping stones or mounting blocks, at frequent intervals along the roads; that Hippocrates and Galen speak of a disease occasioned by long and frequent riding with the legs pendulous and unsupported; and that Germanicus, the father of Caligula, availed himself of this very pendulosity to strengthen his ankles by riding after dinner.

A single goad or sharp point our industrious investigator also found to be the earliest form of spur. That such spurs were worn by horse-soldiers among the Anglo-Saxons, the Normans, and the Anglo-Normans, is evident from the effigies in the Temple Church. The shanks were afterwards bent to fit the ankle. The rowelled spur is supposed by Sir Samuel Meyrick to have been invented in the reign of Henry III. Spurs were, in the feudal period, frequently decorated with real or fictitious jewels; but these were holiday spurs—for tournaments, and not for the rough usage of war. Spurs of gold were occasionally talked about. During the reign of Henry V. and his son, spurs with frightfully long spiked rowels were in fashion, and they became longer and longer until they reached the length of eight inches. Henry VIII. set the fashion of a close rowel, shaped somewhat like a star, and much less penetrant and aggravating. Mottoes on the shanks were common in the tournaments of Elizabeth's reign; one which we have read of bore on one side, "A true knight am I," and on the other, "Anger me and try."—Ripon, in the sixteenth century, was famous for its spur making.

There are some very odd usages connected with spurs. An adventure of an officer of engineers some years ago at Peterboro', brought to light many curious particulars with regard to one. He had entered the cathedral with his spurs on, and was immediately surrounded by the choristers demanding "spur-money. An appeal to the cathedral dignitaries elicited no information as to the custom; but the subject was taken up in the pages of Notes and Queries, and the boys were found to be in the right. But the exaction would seem to have been in use at least as early in 1562. In a book, whose title we have mislaid, published in that year, occurs the following passage:—"We think it very necessarye that every quirister shalde bring with him to churche a Testament in Englishe, and turn to every chapter as it is duely read; or some other good and godly prayer-bocke; rather than spend their tyme in talk, and hunting after spur-money, wherein they set their whole studies, and do often abuse drywers if they doe not bestowe moneybut on them." Before leaving the subject, we may add that on the lobby wall of All Saint's Church at Hinckley are written many verses, of which the following is said to be one:

WRECK OF THE "FLORA TEMPLE."

FRIGHTFUL LOSS OF LIFE.

Nearly a thousand human beings cast away. &c. &c.

MUTINY OF COOLIES.

From the New York Herald.

The following graphic report of the terrible wreck of the American clipper ship Flora Temple, of Baltimore, in the China Sea, on the 8th of October, with the loss of 850 coolies and 18 Europeans, has been sent from Hong Kong by the overland route from China, via Marseilles. It is written by Dr. A. P. Child, F.R.C.S., who was a passenger on board, and consequently an eye witness to the fearful scenes he describes so vividly.

The following is his letter:

Hong Kong, China, Nov. 13, 1859.

The Flora Temple as fine a merchant ship, perhaps, as ever entered the China Sea, left Macao for Havana, on Saturday morning, the 8th of October, 1859, having on board a crew of fifty, all told, and eight hundred and fifty coolies. On the following Friday, the 14th of October, at 7.30 p.m., she struck upon one of the numerous reefs not marked upon the charts, which render the navigation of the China Sea so uncertain and dangerous. For two days previous a gale of wind had been blowing S. W., accompanied by a high sea, during which sail had been reduced to double reefed top-sails and courses, and although on Friday morning the wind had much abated, it still remained S. W. (shifting westerly), the captain was unwilling to make more sail, fearing lest a current might have set the ship to the eastward, in the direction of the reefs marked upon the charts. Fortunately, the sights at 12 o'clock in the morning were good and quite reliable, and our position seemed to be so far (thirty-six miles) to the westward of the most westerly reefs in the latitude in which we then were, that (the ship coming up to S. ¼ E.) the captain, having ordered a good lookout to be kept on the foretopmast yard, apprehended no danger from standing on until eight o'clock, p. m., at which hour he had given orders that the ship should be put about. It was 7.20, p.m. that upon coming upon the poop deck from the tea table he inquired if a good lookout had been kept from the topsail yard. The officer on deck said "Yes." He was sent forward to see, and had hardly reached the forecastle when he heard the cry of "Hard up" from the lookout. The helm was instantly put hard up, and the spanker lowered. No sooner was this done when "Hard down" was heard from the officer, who by this time had come aft again to the gangway. In fact the ship was within a very short distance of the breakers, which could now be distinctly seen and heard from the after part of the poop, where we were standing, and which extended in a curved line from about four points on our starboard bow to about three points on our port bow; they were close aboard; it seemed impossible a long ship like the Flora Temple should escape them, and although the yards were braced round and the ship hove aback, she struck, first lightly, and then, very soon afterwards, several times with a tremendous crash, the breakers running very high alongside. Such was the position, from which it was found impossible to extricate her. Having a list apon the water she had rapidly increased from two and a half feet till it had reached the between decks, vessel could be preserved. While this was going on—indeed almost immediately after the ship first struck—a fear that the coolies would rise and murder all on board seemed to have possessed itself of the minds of the crew, and to such a height did this rise, that the Captain (having at the time, however, no intention of abandoning the ship) had the two quarter boats lowered, and placed an officer and five men in each, with orders to remain near the ship, so that refuge might be at hand, if by any chance they should become needful. The crew were thoroughly unmanned; their only anxiety seemed to be to leave the ship, no matter how, and had it not been for the Captain, his indefatigable brother, and one or two others on board, the boats would have left the ship absolutely unprovided with the merest necessaries of life—the men could be got to do nothing. The boats were lowered about ten o'clock. Having past round the northern extremity of the line of breakers, the Captain in the long boat boat joined the quarter boat, with the smaller boats in company, the port quarter boat with the second mate in charge having deserted us during the night, alarmed probably at the firing of the guns, which, to their terrified ears, seemed to denote another outbreak of the coolies. The Captain had all transferred from the dingies to the longboat and quarter boat, and about nine, a.m., a sail was made to the westward. In a very short time the wind increased till it became a severe gale from WSW., accompanied by a tremendous sea and heavy rain. The boats parted company, and henceforth I can only speak of the one in which, by the providence of God, after fourteen days and nights of exposure, we arrived safely at Touran, Cochin China. During Saturday the 16th, Sunday, Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, the gale continued without abatement, and we remained hove to under a close reefed mainsail, with a bucket veered out to twenty fathoms. The boat was an open one, and we were drenched with the seas that broke over us, tied with the rain, which night and day continued almost without intermission, as it seemed to us.—We were covered with salt water boils, our feet were terribly swollen and pained; we had saved nothing but what we stood in, and had no change; a wet biscuit and half a pint of water a day was all we dared to venture on; sleep was almost impossible; the mate got moody, watched, and debated every movement of the boat, as well as the one we inhabited (as we took it in turns to watch), with a jealous eye, and seemed to consider the Captain the wreck, as on the back of the mouth of Touran, and remained all night with a loaded pistol, on account of the strong currents which the night before had swept the boats much, and kept us from making the land. Finally, on Saturday, the 23rd, we made the mouth of the river, and were picked up by a Cochin Chinese boat, and towed into Touran. Here we were received with the greatest kindness by the Governor, who, on learning that the vessel from the name of the chart, and wreck from the date of the disaster." But before this letter could be sent to Touran. His other officers had been murdered by the coolies was declared elected, the Clerk presented the declaration for signature, to Mr. Payne at the same time, Mr. Wigmore the late Reeve, cautioned Mr. Payne of what he was doing. This conduct of the Clerk, I think is trampling upon our rights. (Hear, hear.) When the returning officer gave in his return, Mr. Hill tried to intimidate him and get him to acknowledge Mr. Payne returned. I told Mr. Hill he had no right to interfere with the Returning Officer, upon which I was silenced. I told him I was Returning Officer of Ward No. 1, but as the member returned was one of their own sycophants, my return was not objected to, and now, gentlemen, seeing that roguery is apparent, and Heaven knows how long it has been going on, we should take strong steps to counteract such injustice. (Hear hear.) Our Ward is very much opposed, to what has been done and hold that Mr. Hill should not be allowed to do as he pleases with elections. [Hear, hear.]—Gentlemen, there are very few, I am persuaded in the Township, who would not give his mite to test this matter before the proper tribunal, and in conclusion, I would advise that the whole rightful machinery of the law be set in motion. [Applause.]

Mr. Sampson Lukey remarked,—I believe there is a compact party in the Council and they thought it treason, to admit Mr. Manley as thereby more of their proceedings would leak out.

Mr. Manley.—I suppose it takes a rogue to catch a rogue. [Laughter.]

Mr. Carruth.—I think the greatest objection they have is this if Mr. Manley got into the Council, Mr. Hill would loose his Chairship, and I am fully persuaded this is Mr. Hill's idea, at least I have heard so from some of his neighbours, who are against his unjust proceedings. I will support legal proceedings.

Thos. Choate, rose and said,—Mr. Chairman these proceedings virtually make Mr. Esplen a perjured man and as men, we should protect him from such unjust aspersions; he then moved the following which was seconded by Mr. Lambden:

Resolved. "That this meeting views with indignation and alarm the unjust and illegal proceeding of the Township Clerk by which William Manley, Esq., has been deprived of his seat as a Councillor and by which the electors of this ward have been grossly insulted and deprived of their municipal rights of being represented in Council by their duly elected member."

I said indignation and also alarm. I have for many years entertained a high opinion of Mr. Hill's integrity, but I must admit, my good opinions are shaken. These fully express my views, for he is not only entrusted with the Clerkship, but with the Treasurership, Sub-treasurership, and also with the superintending of education of our children, and I think that if he does such unrighteous acts as this, he may deprive us of more of our liberties without our detection, and even may cause us to look with fear to the finances. However, we are warned.

A conversation here ensued between the Chairman, Messrs. Manley, McNaughton, Lukey, McKellar, and Douglas, after which it was moved by

T. G. Choate, seconded by Alex. Smith and

Resolved,—That this meeting views with utter contempt the conduct of Mr. George Payne, the defeated candidate at the late municipal election, for this Ward, in taking his seat, knowing that he was not elected, and that it is also the opinion of this meeting that Mr. Payne is a mere tool in the hands of others.

Moved by Mr. McKellar, seconded by W. Douglas, and

Resolved,—That this meeting resent the insult given to the majority of the electors of this Ward by the Township Clerk, saying it would cost too much to contest the election when he refused Mr. Manley his seat in the Council and we further pledge ourselves to find means to contest our rights before the proper authorities.

Moved by Mr. Choate, seconded by Mr. Manley,—That the proceedings of this meeting be sent to the Examiner and Review newspapers for publication.

Mr. Thos. Choate was then voted to the chair and a vote of thanks given to Mr. Kidd for his impartial conduct in the chair after which the meeting separated.

I will here remark that we have seldom seen a more harmonious meeting in this place and that every resolution was carried unanimously.

THOMAS RIGGS, Secretary.

State Convention & Procession of the Sons of Malta.

The much talked of midnight parade of the Sons of Malta, came off last night, and was a perfect success, about five hundred Sons participating.

At the close of the Convention, the resident and visiting members were escorted to the supper room immediately above the Lodge Room. Here we do not know what passed; but precisely as the clock struck twelve, that hour when church yards yawn, the members of this singular Order, were seen emerging into the street, from the rooms where many a strange and weird transaction has, undoubtedly, taken place. Like ghosts they appeared and formed in line for procession.

In front of all, was a strange looking human being, dressed entirely in red, and looking more like an inhabitant of the infernal regions than a dweller upon earth, upon a white horse strangely caparisoned was he seated, and many were the eyes on the line of march, that were attracted by his appearance. Immediately after this hideous representation of one of his Satanic Majesty's hosts, came four Sons, dressed in the usual robes worn by the lay members of the Order. They seemed to be an advanced guard, sent forward to see that their commander received no harm, and to marshal on the host that followed. Next came a band of music, playing the Son's of Malta Marchby a most pleasing arrangement of sweet sounds. Then came an immense body, by four by by three. The members from this time threw its bright rays [illegible] the front of the procession. Then a [illegible] lay-sons glistening [illegible] and members of the Grand Commandery, who appeared in all the splendor assumed to their condition, as Sons of Malta, to fulfil the duties entrusted to their hands.

The [illegible] Grand Commander was habited in the rich robes of an orange color, with the usual Maltese cape and white sash. He bore a hilt hand sword ornamented with jewels of gold and silver, and presented a most splendid appearance. What Kind of Cows should Farmers Keep.

They should keep those, which, all things considered, are the most profitable. An answer to the question is frequently given, substantially as follows:—The farmers who gets his profit from selling milk by measure, should keep those which yield the greatest quantity of milk; the butter and cheese dairyman, those producing, respectively, the largest amount of butter or cheese; and the grazier, those producing the greatest quantity of beef. These answers are incorrect, both in theory and in practice, where profit is to be regarded. Not a word as to the quality or intrinsic value of the product, or the cost of obtaining it.—Suppose, in either of the above cases, that two animals are found, one yielding largely in amount, but of poor quality, and at an expense in food, risk, interest, &c., such as to leave the net profit small—the other one yielding only half that quantity, but good in quality, and at an expense, as before, such that the profit is greater than with the first—which animal shall be kept? Evidently not the one yielding the greatest quantity, and the least profit. What will become of the cows when the service for which they are kept is finished? Are they to die on hand, a total loss, or be fed on for beef, and return a profit? But will they pay for the food they consume in fattening? Are calves to be raised from any of them? If not, where will cows be had when the old stock is gone? If there is, will they be good in quality, because profitable stock in any capacity? What of the male calves—will they make workers or profitable feeders? Here are many things to be considered, besides the mere quantity of the produce in some as capacity, and there are many more that should be considered in every case; hence the cow of but one virtue or qualification is not the cow for any body to keep.

Farmers pursuing a system of mixed husbandry as nearly all our farmers are, require stock for use in all cases named, and in more beside. They must rear young stock to take the place of the old, when that is disposed of; they want cattle for fattening, oxen for work, cows for breeders, for milk, for butter, and for cheese dairying. They cannot keep a distinct breed for each purpose, and hence, must have a race combining, in a greater or a less degree of perfection, all the qualities fitting them for use in each and every case; and they must afford a profit in each capacity, and a profit on the aggregate of all the uses combined. The one capacity breed will not answer the Farmer's purpose. He must look at all the uses to which his stock are to be put, and determine which will yield him the greatest ultimate benefit; and these when found are the race for the Farmer's use.

They should be a race which are constitutionally healthy and hardy, without which any breed are of little practical value.—They should possess symmetry of form, the several parts, justly and duly proportioned, combining the beauty of utility. And such perfection of form may be taken as an indication of perfection in capacity. They ought not to be of an extreme size, the medium animals of all races being more perfect in their physical organization, more uniform in their growth, more economical feeders, yielding better in proportion to the food consumed, and their offspring of better quality, than can be expected from the extremes in size. They should be active, nimble, and free, able to travel with ease in cropping their food, and to or from pasture without fatigue, and, yet be of a quiet and peaceable disposition, not needlessly rambling about, and, still, not sluggish and dull. They must be able to endure the changes of weather, the heat and drought of summer, the colds, storms, inclemencies of winter without suffering severely from either extreme. They must be capable of thriving on coarse fodder, not require pampering on highly stimulating food to keep them up in fair condition.

They should yield a good quantity of rich milk, which shall make a large proportional quantity of butter of excellent quality, or a good quantity of rich cheese. The milk obtained must be economically produced, being large in quantity in proportion to the cost in food consumed.

They must, invariably, be good breeders, which, coupled with good bulls, will always produce good calves. And these calves must be capable of being profitably fattened at any age, yielding veal or beef of the best quality; or if they are to be kept and reared for stock, the heifers must inherit all the good qualities of their dams, as much, at least, as is possible with any breed or race, and the males must be thrifty, hardy, active, and strong, yet gentle, docile, and tractable, possessing, as much as may be, uniformity of size, build, and temperament, making good, honest, and profitable workers, being easily matched in color and in all other requisites; and they must be profitable growers, fattening rapidly when required filling up well at all the choice points, the proportion of bone and offal being small, and the yield in weight of beef, large in comparison with the amount of food consumed. And, when fattened, they must be able to go to market without distress, under shrinkage and loss of weight, or becoming foot sore and distressed.

All these qualities should be combined in the farmer's breed of cattle. They should select that breed possessing all these qualities, if such as one can be found, and continue to improve them in all these qualities simultaneously, neglecting no one quality lest it be lost to their stock. If no such breed can be found, let the improvement of the native be such as to combine these qualities and obtain such a race. The combination of all these qualities in the same breed is practicable, having been accomplished in several instances.

PHONOGRAPHY,

OR

WRITING BY SOUND!!

PHONOGRAPHY was invented by ISAAC PITMAN, of Bath, England, in the year 1837. It is the most simple, most natural, most rapid, and most easily learned system of writing which has ever been, or ever can be invented.

During the past fifteen years, hundreds of thousands of persons, in England and America, in both public and private life, have learned to write Phonography, and thousands of social and business letters annually pass through the post office.

Nor is the great popularity to be wondered at. The present system of writing is exceedingly cumbersome, and totally unworthy these days of progress and invention. Phonography is equally as legible, can be learned in one twentieth the time, and can be written six times as fast! In other words, the labor of six days can be performed in one—one man can do the work of six. So simple is the system, too, that a person may learn to write it clearly, in a couple of hours. An hour's daily practice for a few weeks will enable any person to write Phonography with certainty, and with some degree of freedom. The same amount of practice continued for six months will enable a person to take reports of speeches lectures, sermons, or conversation, and to read them with accuracy.

The late Hon. Thos. H. Benton, upon being presented with a verbatim report of one of his masterly speeches, taken by a little boy only twelve years of age, said: "Had this art been known 40 years ago it would have saved me 20 years hard labor." The learned senator spoke but a portion of the truth. What long-hand requires six years to accomplish, Phonography will perform in one.

To clergymen, Editors, Physicians, Lawyers, Secretaries, Conveyancers, Law and Medical Students, Lecturers, Printers, School Teachers, Merchants, School Boys and Girls, a knowledge of Phonography is of vast utility. In fact there is no profession or calling in which it is not useful, and no young man's education can be considered complete without it.

During the past 9 months hundreds of persons in Canada, of every pursuit in life, have acquired the Art, from many of whom the subscriber has received neatly-written phonographic letters, expressive of their delight with the attainment, and the extraordinary ease with which they have acquired it.

For the purpose of aiding in the dissemination of so important a reform in his own country, the subscriber is now prepared to supply all who apply, with the MANUAL OF PHONOGRAPHY, and the PHONOGRAPHIC COPY BOOK, post by mail to any part of the Province, postage pre-paid, for the small sum of ONE DOLLAR.

Anybody and everybody, who can learn anything, can learn PHONOGRAPHY from the MANUAL without other assistance. Those who wish to be able to put their thoughts to paper at the rate of from 100 to 250 words per minute, should send for the above-mentioned works at once. The instruction given by the Manual is as plain as A. B. C., and ten times as easy to understand.

"THE CANADIAN PHONETIC PIONEER"

Is a Monthly Journal, devoted to the advocacy of the Reform. Price 25 cents per annum.

STARTLING BUT TRUE!

SURVIVE OR PERISH.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.

The history of this great remedy is the most wonderful medical revelation that the world has ever known. It is not a history written by one man, or even derived from the experience of one nation, but consists of a compilation of testimonials from the sick of every country—a record, the like of which has never been added to in favour of any discovery or invention since time began.

BILIOUS DISORDERS.

In whatever form disease attacks the liver, it is repelled and exterminated by the searching, painless and irresistible curative.

Let the sick whom the faculty have abandoned resort with confidence to this antibilious agent, and a restoration to health and activity will be the unvarying result.

DYSPEPSIA.

The great scourge of this continent yields quickly to a course of these antiseptic Pills and the digestive organs are restored to their proper tone; no matter in what hideous shape this hydra of disease exhibits itself, this searching and unerring remedy disperses it from the patient's system.

GENERAL DEBILITY AND WEAKNESS.

From whatever cause, lowness or nervous, and all other signs of a diseased liver, and other disorganization of the system, vanish under the ovadicating influences of this all powerful antiseptic and detergent remedy.

SICKLY FEMALES

Should lose no time in trying a few doses of this regulating and renovating remedy; whatever may be their complaint, it can be taken with safety in all periodical and other derangements; its effect is all but miraculous.

Holloway's Pills are the best remedy known in the world for the following diseases:

Asthma,	Headaches,
Bowel Complaints,	Indigestion,
Coughs,	Inflammation,
Colds,	Inward Weakness
Chest Diseases,	Liver Complaints,
Costiveness,	Lowness of Spirits,
Dyspepsia,	Lumbago,
Diarrhœa,	Piles,
Dropsy,	Stone and Gravel,
Debility,	Secondary Symptoms,
Fever and Ague,	Venereal Affections.
Female Complaints,	Worms of all kinds.

☞ CAUTION!—None are genuine unless the words "Holloway, New York and London," are discernible as a Water-mark in every leaf of the book of directions around each pot or box; the same may be plainly seen by holding the leaf to the light. A handsome reward will be given to any one rendering such information as may lead to the detection of any party or parties counterfeiting the medicines or vending the same, knowing them to be spurious.

* * Sold at the Manufactory of Professor HOLLOWAY, 80 Maiden Lane, New York, and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicine throughout the United States and the civilized world, in boxes at 25 cents, 62 cents and $1 each.

☞ There is considerable saving by taking the larger sizes.

N. B.—Directions for the guidance of patients in every disorder are affixed to each box.

PRACTICAL EXPERIENCE,

EXPERIMENTAL SCIENCE.

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.

CONSOLATION FOR THE SUFFERING.

Nearly fifty years continual use in every part of the habitable globe, amongst the savage and the civilized alike, has proved that simple eruptions, open sores, hard tumors, scrofulous developments of all kinds, abscesses, cancers, old wounds, and, in one word, every species of inflammation and suppuration, whether in the skin, the flesh, the glands, or among the muscles, can be arrested and permanently cured, without danger, by rubbing in and using as a dressing, this inestimable Ointment.

SCROFULA, ERYSIPLAS, AND SALT RHEUM, ERUPTIONS OF THE SKIN, PILES, AND FISTULA.

No remedy has ever done so much for the cure of diseases of the Skin, whatever form they may assume, as this Ointment. No case of Salt Rheum, Scurvy, Sore Heads, Scrofula or Erysiplas, can long withstand its influence.

BAD LEGS, OLD SORES, ULCERS, &c.

Cases of many years standing that have pertinaciously refused to yield to any other remedy or treatment, have invariably succumbed to a few applications of this powerful unguent.

Arising from a bad state of the blood or obnoxious disease, are eradicated, and a clear as if transparent surface regained by the restorative action of this Ointment. It surpasses many of the connection and other toilet appliances in its power to dispel rashes and other disfigurements of the face.

Every form and feature of these prevalent and stubborn disorders is eradicated locally and entirely by the use of this emollient; warm fomentations should precede his application. Its healthy qualities will be found to be thorough and invariable.

Both the Ointment and Pills will be used in the following cases:

Bunions,	Skin Diseases,
Burns,	Swelled Glands,
Chapped Hands,	Sore Legs,
Chilblains,	Sore Breasts,
Fistula,	Sore Heads
Gout,	Sore Throats,
Lumbago,	Sores of all kinds,
Mercurial Eruptions,	Sprains,
Piles,	Stiff Joints,
Ringworm,	Tetter,
Salt Rheum,	Ulcers,
Scalds,	Venereal Sores,
Skalds,	Wounds of all kinds.

☞ CAUTION!—None are genuine unless the words "Holloway, New York and London" are discernible as a Water-mark in every leaf of the book of directions around each pot or box; the same may be plainly seen by holding the leaf to the light. A handsome reward will be given to any one rendering such information as may lead to the detection of any party or parties counterfeiting or vending the same, knowing them to be spurious.

* * Sold at the Manufactory of Professor HOLLOWAY, 80 Maiden Lane, New York, and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicine throughout the United States and the civilized world, in pots at 25 cents, 62 cents, and $1 each.

To meet the extensive increase, during the last year in the business of the house, the proprietor has built a large addition. The Dining Room has been extended and made more commodious; there have been completed in the new wing, a great number of well-ventilated sleeping rooms, and the House throughout has been refitted, and now contains many improvements and conveniences hitherto unknown to its guests. The whole of the beds have, at a great expence, been furnished with NEW SPRING MATTRASSES. The Proprietor expects that by continuing his personal management of the concern, THE ALBION, to say the least of it, will continue to be, as it now is, the best Dollar and a half Hotel in Canada.

Selected Poetry.

IN THE CITY.

In the city, in the city,
Hearts there be that run to waste,
Hearts that in their wayward folly
Blindly still refuse to taste
Those dear joys long learn'd elsewhere
On the north dank sweetly be,
Guided by her smiles and whispers
Unto light and liberty.

In the city, in the city,
Oh! how many never know
Those serene and tearless blessings,
High-borne virtue can bestow;
Never fearing, still careering
On the road that leads to death;
Heeding not the voice of reason,
Strangers they to princely faith.

In the city, in the city,
Ah! how many weeping hearts,
Pained by those that vowed to love them,
Wounded by envenomed darts!
Ah! how many sorrowing angels
Wander there by day, by night,
Some of peace, and joy evangels,
Some of nether hope nor light.

In the city, in the city,
Many a regal soul must stoop
'Neath a load of sordid carings
Till its dust soiled pinions droop—
Drop for want of common comforts
To conserve it for the flight,
On the wings of mighty gentus,
To the home of Truth and Light.

In the city, in the city,
Ah how many meet dispair!
Some in balls, and some in parlours—
Madly deeming that they ne'er
May again restore the fortunes
Of the soul they loved so well
And so wisely—for their values
Words may never dare to tell.

In the city, in the city,
Ah how many madly dare,
By the beams from Pleasure's eyelids,
To hide memory of care:
Still forgetting, that for ever
Cares and grief shall follow them
Till they gain in fiery battle
Virtue's princely diadem,

JOHN GEO. THEARSON.

A MIFT IN THE CLOUD.

Andrew Lee came home at evening from the shop where he had worked all day, tired and out of spirits, came home to his wife, who was also tired and out of spirits.

"A smiling wife and a cheerful home—what a paradise it would be!" said Andrew to himself as he turned his eyes from the clouded face of Mrs. Lee. and sat down with knitted brow and a moody aspect.

Not a word was spoken by either. Mrs. Lee was getting supper, and she moved about "Come," she said at last, with a side glance at her husband.

There was invitation in the word only, none in the voice of Mrs. Lee.

Andrew rose and went to the table. He was tempted to speak an angry word, but controlled himself, and kept silence. He could find no fault with the chop, nor the sweet home-made bread, nor the fragrant tea. They would have cheered his inward man, if there had only been a gleam of sunshine on the face of his wife. He noticed that she did not eat.

"Are you not well, Mary?" The words were on his lips, but he did not utter them, for the face of his wife looked so repellant that he feared an irritating reply. And so, in moody silence, the twain sat together until Andrew had finished his supper. As he passed his chair back, his wife rose and commenced clearing off the table.

"This is purgatory," said Lee to himself, as he commenced walking the floor of their little breakfast-room, with his hands thrust desperately away down into his trousers pockets, and his chin almost touching his breast.

After removing all the dishes, and taking them into the kitchen, Mrs. Lee spread a green cover on the table, and placed a fresh trimmed lamp thereon, went out and shut the door after her, leaving her husband alone with his unpleasant feelings. He took a long deep breath as she did so, paused in his walk, stood still for some moments, and then drawing a paper from his pocket, sat down by the table, opened the sheet, and commenced reading. Singularly enough, the words upon which his eyes rested were "Praise your wife." They rather tended to increase the disturbance of mind from which he was suffering.

"I should like to find some occasion for praising mine." How quickly his thoughts expressed that ill-natured sentiment. But his eyes were on the page before him, and he read on.

"Praise your wife, man; for pity's sake give her a little encouragement; it won't hurt her."

Andrew Lee raised his eyes from the paper, and muttered, "O, yes. That's all very well. Praise is cheap enough. But praise her for what? For being sullen, and making your home the most disagreeable place in the world?" His eyes fell again to the paper.

"She has made your home comfortable, your hearth bright and shining, your food agreeable; for pity's sake, tell her you think her, if nothing more. She don't expect it; it will make her eyes open wider than they have for ten years; but it will do her good for all that, and you, too."

It seemed to Andrew as if this sentence were written just for him, and just for the occasion. It was the complete answer to the question, "Praise her for what?" and he felt it also as a rebuke. He read no further, for thoughts came too busy, and in a new direction. Memory was ransacking him of injustice towards his wife. She had always made his home as comfortable for him as hands could make it, and had he offered the light return of praise or encouragement? Had he ever told her of the satisfaction he had known, or the comfort experienced? He was not able to recall the time or the occasion. As he thought there, Mrs. Lee came in from the kitchen, and taking her work-basket from a corner, placed it on the table, and sitting down, without speaking, began to sew. Mr. Lee glanced almost deprecatingly at the work in her hands, and saw that it was the bosom of a shirt, which she was stitching neatly. He knew that it was for him that she was at work.

"Praise your wife." The words were before the eyes of his mind, and he could not look away from them. But he was not ready for this yet. He still felt moody and unforgiving. His eyes fell upon the newspaper that lay spread out before him, and he read the sentence—

"A kind, cheerful word, spoken in a home, is like the gift in a cloud that lets the sunshine through."

Lee struggled with himself a little longer. His own ill-nature had to be conquered first; his moody, accusing spirit had to be subdued. But he was coming right, and at last got right, as to will. Next came the question as to how he should begin.—He thought of many things to say, yet feared to say them, lest his wife should meet his advances with a cold rebuff. At last, leaning towards her, and taken hold of the linen bosom upon which she was at work, he said, in a voice carefully modulated with kindness.

"You are doing the work very beautifully, Mary."

Mrs. Lee made no reply. But her husband did not fail to observe that she lost, almost instantly, that rigid erectness, with which she had been sitting, nor that the motion of her needle had ceased.

"My shirts are better made, and whiter than those of any other man in the shop," said Lee, encouraged to go on.

"Are they?" Mrs. Lee's voice was low, and had in it a slight sadness. She did not turn her face, but her husband saw that she leaned a little towards him. He had broken through the ice of reserve, and all was easy now. His hand was among the clouds, and a few feble rays were already struggling through the rift it had made.

"Yes, Mary," he answered, softly; "and I've heard it said more than once, what a good wife Andrew Lee must have."

Mrs. Lee turned her face towards her husband. There was light in it, and light in her eye. But there was something in the expression of the countenance that a little puzzled him.

"Do you think so?" she asked, quite soberly.

"What a question!" ejaculated Andrew Lee, starting up, and going to the side of the table where his wife was sitting.—"What a question, Mary!" he repeated, as he stood before her.

"Do you?" It was all she said.

"Yes, darling," was the warmly spoken answer, and he stooped down and kissed her, —"How strange that you should ask me such a question!"

"If you would only tell me so now and then, Andrew, it would be more of a guard against the many brunt of her husband, stood and wept.

What a strong light broke in upon the mind of Andrew Lee. He had never given to his faithful wife even the small reward of praise for all the loving, interest she had manifested daily, until doubt of his love had entered her soul, and made the light around her thick darkness. No wonder that her face grew clouded, nor that what he considered moodiness and ill-nature took possession of her spirit!

"You are good and true, Mary. My own dear wife. I am proud of you—I love you—and my first desire is for your happiness. O, if I could always see your face in sunshine, my home would be the dearest place on earth."

"How precious to me are your words of love and praise, Andrew," said Mrs. Lee, smiling up through her tears into his face. "With them in my ears, my heart can never lie in shadow."

How easy had been the work for Andrew Lee. He had swept his hand across the cloudy horizon of his home, and now the bright sunshine was streaming down, and flooding that home with joy and beauty.

CATHOLICISM.

I had been taught to believe that no Pagest thought of Christ, and the idea that I might have wronged them now forced itself upon me. He saw, and understood what I felt. A Romanist does believe in the Lord. He believes all you do, only more, for he does not limit the justice of God, and believes that He will not condemn irrecoverable for the deeds done in a short life, but, by an intermediate state, would give the sinner another chance of obtaining an entrance into His kingdom. He believes that the living may pray for the dead, making their peace with God. Will you try and believe this for me? Remember I am not dead, either to you or my God; and whatsoever a man asks, believing, he shall receive. I do not ask you to be a Romanist, Mary; God forbid I should so lead you from your Church, but do not judge harshly, if some of them you once called brothers, seek peace in the breast of a Church whose precepts speak ease to the bereaved heart, and forgiveness to the most hardened sinner. His eyes glistened with a wild light as he spoke, and I did not, nay, could not speak. Why should I combat with him at the hour of death? Why try to darken the hope he clung to; our interview was nearly over; so I only bent my head, and said—"God have mercy upon us, a sinner." The hour came, and we parted, Heaven only, who knoweth the secrets of all, and seeth the heart of man, could understand the unspeakable agony of that parting.—Memoirs of a Lady in Waiting.

HINDU PROVERBS.

The following are translated from the Sanscrit:

"Sweet is the name of the late to him who has never heard the prattle of his own children."

"The house where there is no divine worship is filled with the sighs of God."

"When the salt water rises to the clouds it leaves its saltness, and becomes fresh and sweet; so with the human soul."

"Do good to others, and it will come back to blessings to you. The water which you pour at the foot of the cocoa tree, comes back to you a sweet beverage at the top," alluding to the fact that the tree requires frequent watering, and that its fruit, which grows at the extreme top, is filled with a delicious milk.

SOWING AND REAPING.

"As ye have sown so shall ye reap that day."

Notwithstanding the great value of time, most men use it in pursuit of unworthy objects. This is the course of the sifter, who thinks that the great end of life is the acquisition of wealth. Such a creature is of no use to world, and often his heirs impatiently await his death. Can a more favorable judgment be passed upon the ambitious man than upon the miser? That applause of the multitude is more apt to be bestowed upon the villain and the madman than upon the wise and virtuous. Charles the twelfth of Sweden, was not the only hero who ought to have been confined in the mad-house.—Byron would have been less a curse to the world than he was had he been a cobbler. And what shall be said to the pleasure seeker? He lives as though he were born merely to eat, drink, sleep and die. A million such beings would be dearly purchased were they gained in exchange for one true man. They are more burdens upon society, and a nation of Chesterfields would be a nation of fools. All these characters are waiting for their time in pursuit of unworthy objects, as is every one who does not labor for the glory of God and the good of mankind. No man can innocently be a cipher in society.

There is enough to do in the cause of God and humanity. The ignorant are to be instructed, and the victims reclaimed—the youth of our land are to be shielded from the allurements and led into the paths of virtue,—the oppressed are to be released from their burdens, and the inebriate brought back to sobriety—the Church is to be aroused to her duty toward those who are destitute of the Gospel; and the empire of superstition is to be overthrown. If we are ever saved we must, by the blessing of God work out our own salvation by overcoming our evil passions and keeping a constant watch over our spiritual foes. Is not all this enough to fill up the longest life?—The poet who wrote the profane couplet,

"Life is a dream and all things show it,
I thought so once and now I know it."

for his own epitaph, has, doubtless, by this time, found out his mistake. Life is a fearful reality, and in a very important sense,

"Man is the maker of immortal fates."

He is here forming a character that is to fix his destiny beyond the grave, and none but he who has carefully read the lessons we have set before him.—How many a life that has gained the applause of the world, will lose all its glory when it comes to be viewed in the light of eternity. It will then afford no consolation to him who has lived to himself, that his fellow men thought him once fortunate. The man of misapplied talents will not then congratulate himself upon the use he has made of his mental powers,—the miser will then be fully convinced of his folly in sacrificing the eternal interests of his soul for the love of gold,—bitter to the man of pleasure will be the recollection of his hours of hilarity and revelry. But while all these shall shrink from the frowns of the infinitely just God, the good man shall then receive the reward for his life of labor in the vineyard of Our Father.—S. S. Leonard.

GENIUS DEFINED.

The greatest results in life are usually attained by simple means, and the exercise of ordinary qualities. The common life of every day, with its cares, necessities, and duties, affords ample opportunity for acquiring experience of the best kind; and its most beaten paths provide the true worker with ample scope for effort and room for self-improvement. The great high-road of human welfare lies along the old highway of steadfast well-doing; and they who are the most persistent, and work in the truest spirit, will invariably be the most successful. Fortune has often been blamed for her blindness; but fortune is not so blind as men are. Those who look into practical life will find that fortune is invariably on the side of the industrious, as the winds and waves are on the side of the best navigators. Success treads on the heels of every right effort; and though it is possible to over-estimate success as the extent of almost defying it, as is sometimes done, still in any worthy pursuit, it is meritorious. Nor are the qualifications necessary to ensure success at all extraordinary. They may, for the most part, be summed up in those two—common sense and perseverance. Genius may not be necessary, though even genius of the highest sort does not despise the exercise of these common qualities. The very greatest men have been among the best believers in the power of genius, and as worthy wise and persevering as successful men of the commoner sort. Some have even defined genius to be only common sense intensified. A distinguished inventor and president of a college spoke of it as the power of making efforts. John Foster held it to be the power of lighting one's own fire. Buffon said of genius—it is patience.—Self-help; with Illustrations of Character and Conduct.

WASHINGTON IRVING & WASHINGTON.

But Mr. Irving had himself seen General Washington. He said there was many celebration going on in New York, and the General was there to participate in the ceremony. "My nurse," continued Mr. Irving "a good old Scotchwoman, was very anxious for me to see him, and held me up in her arms as he rode past. This, however, did not satisfy her. So the next day, when walking with me in Broadway, she espied him in a shop; she seized my hand, and shoving in, confronted, to her bland Scotch, 'Please your Excellency, here's a little lad's called after ye!' General Washington then turned his benevolent face full upon me, smiled, laid his hand on my head, and gave me his blessing, which," added Mr. Irving, earnestly, "I have reason to believe extended to me through life. I was but five years old at the time, and I trust God heard every word."—Once a Week.

NEAPOLITAN POLICE DEXTERITY.

A correspondence from Naples, says:—"some of Garibaldi's paper is now in circulation, in the shape of printed receipts, which are exchanged for money, and that money goes toward the subscription opened by the General. What did the police do in the affair? They naturally wished to cover the partisan guilty of circulating this paper, but it was difficult to do so. Domiciliary visits would scarcely answer the purpose, as a bundle of small papers might be easily concealed. There were, moreover, houses which the police dare not search,—the consulates, for instance—and it was precisely a consul who was suspected of being the promoter of the subscription.—The case was serious and delicate, but Mr. Ajossa, the director of police, is not a man to be disconcerted by a trifle. He authorized the police to arrest persons in the street and to search them on the spot. One man was particularly pointed out to them whom they were to arrest by mistake—namely, M. Fasciotti, the Sardinian consul. He was, in fact, stopped a few evenings ago in the street and searched. Nothing was found on him but he was taken to the theatre San Carlos, where Ajossa gives his audiences. The director of police overwhelmed him with excuses, and the consul was compelled volens volens to be satisfied with that reparation."

THE GEOGRAPHY OF CONSUMPTION.

Consumption originates in all latitudes—from the equator, where the mean temperature is 80 degrees, with slight variations, to the higher portion of the temperate zone, where the mean temperature is 40 degrees, with sudden and violent changes. The opinion, long entertained, that it is peculiar to cold and humid climates, is founded on error. Far from this being the case, the tables of the mortality warrant the conclusion that consumption is more prevalent in tropical than temperate countries. Consumption is rare in the Arctic regions, in Siberia, Iceland, the Faroe Islands, the Orkneys, Shetlands, and Hebrides. And in confirmation of the opinion that it decreases with the decrease of temperature, it is shown, from extensive data, that in northern Europe it is most prevalent at the level of the sea, and that it decreases with increase of elevation to a certain point. It is uniformly more fatal in cities than in the country. Dr. Hall, of the Journal of Health, says to his consumptive friends:—"You want air, and plenty of it. You want exercise, and plenty of it. You want cold water given, and they alone; physic has no sentiment; gropings for air cannot cure you; and stimulants cannot cure you. If you want to get well, go in for beef and out door air, and do not be deluded into the grave by advertisements and unreliable certifiers."

A ROUGH RIDE.—Some days ago Mr. Paton, of Whins, while sitting in his own parlour, heard the sound of horse's feet passing his window, and going to the door to ascertain the cause of the unwonted occurrence, he found one of his servants with a horse saddled and bridled, which he said he had just picked up, riderless, on the turnpike road a short distance off. Mr. Paton immediately proceeded to the adjoining toll-bar to ascertain if any one on horseback had passed there, when he was found mounted astride a low stone wall by the side of the road, gripping his stick with one hand, and holding on by the cope-stone with the other. He seemed to be quite satisfied that he was riding on his own steed, instead of an old stone dyke; for after they had with some difficulty succeeded in partially arousing him, some juveniles who had gathered round, and were enjoying the joke, as only juveniles can, began crying to him, "hold on," "keep a good grip," &c., whereupon he clutched the carpenters with a firmer grasp, and "held on" like a brick. Being assisted down (the marvel was how he had ever managed up), a good Samaritan who came that way took him in charge and conveyed him to a house in the village of Seaside, where he was kindly entertained till reason had resumed her throne.—Allox Journal.

DEATH OF A CHARACTER AT BANNOCKBURN.—An old woman upwards of eighty years, named familiary "Nanny Brown," died on the 18th ult., at Bannockburn, in the garret-room which she occupied. In the corner of a drawer, deposited in an old bag, there has been found, since her death the sum of £100 or thereby, all in silver.—Many of the coins were quite black, and there was only one crown piece amongst them, the rest consisting of shillings, sixpences, and fourpenny and threepenny bits. It is said that, before she died, the old woman kissed the keys of the place where her well hoarded treasure was deposited. Mr. Wilson, of Hill Park, was sent for, and he took possession of the contents. It is reported that Widow Helen Brown or Paton, at Bannockburn, is the next of kin. It is said that a sister of the deceased old woman died about two years ago, and that she also left a considerable sum, and that a part of this, with what she had collected otherwise, formed the extraordinary collection of silver which has been discovered after her death. She was never married, and lived alone in the garret room at Bannockburn where she died.—Allox Journal.

Man's lives should be like the days, more beautiful in the evening; or like the season a glow with promise, and the autumn rich with golden sheaves where good words and deeds have ripened on the soil.

Kind words are the brightest flowers of earth's enticement; they make a paradise of the humblest home the world can show.

There are thousands who covet not only praise but the reputation of despising it.

A Philadelphia Quaker disliking to use a "flag," offered to his cattle, advised a companion not to shoot his horses as low "as without any tail," and he received a reply unintended: "Mine finish, without my tail."

MORE TROUBE IN VIRGINIA.

A NEGRO INSURRECTIONIST SENTENCED TO BE HANGED.

Jerry, a slave belonging to Col. Francis McCormick, of Charles County, Va., was tried in the County last week on a charge of plotting a conspiracy with slaves to rebel and make insurrection. The Conservator reports the case as follows:

The prisoner, with another negro man, was at work in his master's field, when the witness, Mr. Chamblin, a white man, who was a stranger to them, happened to pass that way. Entering into conversations with the negroes, he inquired who was their master, where he was, how many negroes he had, and how many colored men!

These questions were answered with so much alacrity by the man Jerry, who was so willing to communicate the facts, that the white man became suspicious, and finally asked him what he thought of the Harper's Ferry affair. Jerry replied that he was glad to hear of it. "Why were you not there?" asked the witness. "Because I did not know exactly when to go," was the reply. "Would you have gone if you had known?" "Yes, and I have four sons who would have followed me. I would be ready to go at any time." "Would not you go too?" To this the other negro assented and asked the witness if he was one of Brown's men, which being answered in the affirmative, "Yes," added Jerry, "he is going about letting us know." He then told the witness where he would find other negroes, to talk with on the subject, stating that the patrol was out and would not let them (the negroes) go from one place to another without a pass. He said there had been some burnings since the patrol commenced, and that "we will keep on burning until they are stopped."

About ten days afterwards, the same witness went back for the purpose of eliciting more facts from the prisoner. He was gladly received by Jerry, who recognized him, and told him that there had been more burnings since he last saw him, stating that the patrol had not been out that week, and that he and others had made a plot the night before to burn the house of Daniel H. Sowers in the dark of the moon. At that juncture Mr. Alfred Castleman appeared in sight, passing along the road, and Jerry commenced abusing him most violently to the witness, stating that he [illegible] could not get any. (It was proved by another witness, that Jerry was in Berryville the previous Sunday.) They were then joined by the other negro, Joe, and the conversation turned upon John Brown, then in jail under sentence of death, and the possibility of rescuing him—Joe remarking that he had heard that an army was coming to take him out of jail, "and if we join them we can take him out," to which the prisoner (Jerry) assented, provided they could stop the patrol so they could get about.

The Court, composed of five magistrates after hearing the arguments from both sides and duly considering the evidence and arguments, unanimously found the prisoner guilty of plotting and conspiring to excite slaves to rebel and make insurrection, and appointed Friday, the 17th day of February next, for his execution; at the same time strongly recommending him to the mercy of the executive.

Thus has another life been forfeited (as we have not the slightest idea that Governor Letcher will be so indiscreet as to commute Jerry's sentence) to the wicked and diabolical conspiracy of which John Brown, the "murderer-martyr," was but the nominal head, and for which others yet unhung are with him equally responsible.

Mr. Chamblin, the witness in this case, deserves the thanks of the community for having, at his own peril, ferreted out this conspiracy. Like many others who have been most true to Virginia in her hour of trial, he is a non-slaveholder.

Joe, the other slave of Col. McC. above referred to, was ordered to be sold out of the State.

BRITISH COLUMBIA.

We have advices from Victoria to the 24th of December:—

The question of the establishment of a mint in Victoria is being moved in certain quarters, and although it would certainly be very agreeable to the Victorians to exercise the privilege of turning out their own sovereigns, (from Fraser River gold) and clipping off the American eagle, (in its circulation), yet it is feared by many that this progressive will have to be postponed for the present, for the simple but potent reason that "it won't pay." Preparations, however, are being made by the home Government for sending out an assay and melting branch of the mint to Victoria, and Victorians must rest content with that arrangement.

The "gold escort" for British Columbia which has been talked of for a year and more, is to be organized by the Government during the coming Spring—at least, so say the papers "without a head," and it must be so. The following few words tell the old tale that must be told over and over again for some time to come: "shipped by Wells, Fargo & Co's. Express, per steamer "Northerner" (Dec. 12th,) 21,000."—And that's the way the gold dust goes.

The Hudson's Bay Company's hermaphrodite, with a valuable cargo for Fort Yale, was crushed in the ice, below Six Tree Island, about ten days ago. A portion of the cargo was picked up by the Indians.—Victoria Journal, Dec. 24.

A farmer in Scotland sowing a field of turnips, encountered a ridge for the accommodation of the rabbits with this hint—"You are requested to steal outside of this spot."

It is not the height to which men are advanced that makes them giddy; it is the looking down with contempt upon those beneath.—Syrus.

DR. RYERSON ON SEPARATE SCHOOLS.

(Extract from report, 1858.)

If, therefore, the Roman Catholic Separate Schools are of little account, and feebly supported in comparison with the public schools, it is because the supporters of separate schools are less concerned and energetic in the education of their children than are the supporters of public schools, and isolate themselves from the latter in order to avoid paying municipal and public trustee school rates, rather than to employ greater efforts for school purposes; or, because in spite of all appeals and influences on the contrary, the programme portion of the Roman Catholic as well as of the Protestant population prefers the public schools to separate schools, combined nation to isolated action, the principle which is the magna charta as well as characteristic of a free people, to the principle that has been the prop of every despotism which has oppressed mankind; the principle which makes a good education the right of every child in the land, to the principle which in every land where it has prevailed, has left the great majority of the most needy classes of children in ignorance.

* * * * * * * * *

From these comparisons of statistics it is clear that the Roman Catholic Separate Schools have received twice as much from the Legislative Grant as the public schools in proportion to the work performed or the number of pupils taught by them, and that the supporters of Roman Catholic Separate Schools here not done one fourth as much as the supporters of public schools in proportion to the amount of Legislative Aid granted to them. From these facts and the preceding observations on the law relating to public and separate schools, the following references may be drawn:

First, That nothing can be more groundless than the statements and apprehensions expressed by some, that the general school system is endangered or enfeebled by the separate school provisions of the law.

Secondly, That nothing can be more unjust than the assertions and accusations on the part of some supporters of separate schools, that the Department of Public Instruction and the Legislators and people of Upper Canada have treated them unjustly and oppressively—the very reverse of which the forgoing facts and figures show to be the case.

But it is insisted by some advocates of separate schools, that Municipalities should be compelled to levy and collect taxes for the support of separate schools, as well as for the support of public schools. To this it may be replied; First, That the Municipalities are not compelled to levy and collect a farthing for the support of public schools; when they do, they do so voluntarily; and it is in the power of each Municipality to put an end to the public school system within its own limits, by simply declining to levy and collect any rates for school purposes. Secondly, The separate schools are established and conducted for exclusively Roman Catholic denominational purposes. The avowed object of these schools is to train up children under exclusively Roman Catholic influences, and to employ a great part of the school time in teaching and practising the ritual elements and ceremonies of the Roman Catholic Church, and also of inculcating belimes that Protestants are at war with God and His Church, and are subjected to the Diabolical teachings form a part of the esthetical instruction of the separate schools; and it is with the express view of providing for these instructions and ceremonies, that the separation of Roman Catholic children from other children, and the establishment of separate schools, are advocated. Now, whatever may be the right and liberty of teaching in a free State, or whatever the liberality of the State may grant in aid of schools established for the purpose of imparting such instructions, that a free State or a free Municipality should be compelled to support such schools, is a thing unknown in the history of constitutional government, and monstrous in its very conception.—What a feeling of indignation would arise in the mind of every Protestant in Upper Canada, of whatever religious persuasion, were it authoritively proposed to compel the Municipalities to levy and collect rates to support schools for the Episcopalian, or Presbyterian, or Methodist Churches though in the Catechisms of not one of them is there a word in regard to either the Roman Catholic Church or Romanists! Yet it has been insisted upon by some Roman Catholic ecclesiastical leaders, even as their right, that the Municipalities of a free country, and that country mostly Protestants, should be compelled to levy and collect taxes for the support of Roman Catholic schools!

But I remark, secondly, that the public schools exist for no one religious persuasion more than another, but for all classes of citizens alike, without reference to their religious persuasion; that the rights of all religious persuasions are equally protected; that whatever religious instruction is given to any pupil, it is with the consent of his parent and guardian; that no pupil can be required to receive any religious instruction or be present at any religious reading or exercise, or use any religious book against the wish of his parent or guardian; that the pastor of each religious persuasion has the right to each school house within his charge one hour a week for the special religious instruction of the children of his own persuasion in the school; and every resident from the ages of five to twenty-five years, of every religious persuasion in each municipality, has a legal right to attend the school of the section in which he resides, as long as he observes the discipline of the school. Yet no municipality is compelled to levy and collect rates for the support of even these public schools; but any municipality can provide little or much or nothing at all, as it pleases, for the purchase and erection of school-houses, and the support of schools; and it can do the same for any separate school on the application of its supporters, though no municipality in Lower Canada is permitted by law to levy and collect any rate from the supporters of a dissentient school for its support, even on their application.

But when the proposition for the direct imposition of a municipality to levy and collect rates for the support of separate schools is found untenable, it has been proposed indirectly to compel the municipality to do the same thing, by depriving it of the power to levy and collect rates for the support of public schools, unless it at the same time levies and collects such an amount for the support of separate schools, as is proportioned to the Roman Catholic population or property in connection with matters, unless they become agents and tax-gatherers for the support of Roman Catholic Schools—that they should not provide schools at all for the education of all classes, with equal protection, and Roman Catholics equally with other classes, unless they at the same time provide separate schools for the Roman Catholics! A proposition so monstrous in principle as it is impudent in assumption. But this proposition is more odious and outrageous still, in reference to the Roman Catholic population It proposes to do by the law of the land what certain ecclesiastics have warmly but vainly endeavoured to do, namely, to separate the Roman Catholics en masse from the rest of his fellow citizens—to take away from each Roman Catholic all right of choice as to how his money for school purposes shall be applied, or where his children shall receive school instruction, and to isolate him and his children from the rest of the community in which they live, whether they desire it or not!

It has been proposed at the last resort, to insist upon the voluntary principle in education; that is, to deprive the State, and municipalities, and citizens collectively of the power of combining by law the resources of all for the education of all—to leave the vast public and social interests of the education of the youth of the land wholly to isolated, individual impulse and effort—to shut up and sell the public school houses to private speculators, perhaps for grog shops and kindred purposes, and abandon the rising and future generation of our country to the educational freedom of nature—to ignore as a State what in every free and enlightened State is held to be the highest national interest—to transfer Upper Canada from the catalogue of civilized to that of uncivilized nations!

This is a very natural resort for any interest in respect to which knowledge is weakness, and ignorance is power; but it must be as abhorent to the great body of the Roman Catholic community as to all other classes of the population, and is the last and desperate device of a few individuals of one idea and one aim—that of making the priesthood the sole standard of truth and source of knowledge, and of extinguishing every ray of light and every spark of liberty which is not the emanation or creature of that clerical supremacy.

But to the sincere and benevolent supporters of separate schools, the law is indulgent perhaps to a fault, certainly beyond comparison, and the explanations and financial analysis above given prove the more than merely equitable provisions of the law in respect to separate schools, and the corresponding spirit in which I have administered it. But I should be unfaithful to my trust and alien to my country, did I not at the same time show how little has been done in proportion to the Legislative aid received, and in comparison with other sections of the community, by the partisan assailants of our school system, and who in their newspaper organs are equally the assailants of everything sacred to the throne and the liberties the character and prevalent Christianity of the British Empire; and did I not sedulously watch and plainly expose every scheme for subverting or weakening so organization by which the people of Upper Canada can work out their highest educational and social destinies.

The Legislature has faithfully and fully provided for "the equal rights and privileges of all classes" in Upper Canada in our system of public schools, and more than what is "equal" in regard to the Roman Catholics who have all the*same* other religious establish separate schools, not granted to any other religious persuasion.

LETTER FROM VICTORIA.

From the Brampton Times.

The following letter from Mr. Wm. McDonald, which was kindly handed to us by Mr. Robert Graham, of this village, will no doubt be perused with interest by many of our readers:—

VICTORIA, V. I., Nov. 29, 1859.

DEAR SIR,—I propose giving you a general view of matters and things here. On my passage here there was nothing worthy of note transpired. We left most of our human cargo in San Francisco, where I spent five days. Every man from New York is struck with the gentlemanly behaviour of the citizens. One-third of the city is built on spiles, and there are few houses that would be considered good in the Atlantic country.

I would now turn your attention to our rocky home here, and I might add Babel of tongues, and grades of humanity from the Anglo Saxon to the flat-head Indian. You have heard the phrase "head as big as a forty shilling pot," which is lamentably verified in their case, especially that it is the work of art, while they are infants. They are strapped on staves, and great care is taken that the head is flattened back to the particular style of tribe. I have seen some of them so flat that a line drawn on their head from the eye brows to the upper region of philoprogenitiveness would be scarcely curved. The head is pressed out in the region of the ears and backwards. There is another tribe with high heads; the head is one-fourth the length of the body. All the tribes have more or less peculiarities.—On the whole they are the most degraded specimens of humanity I ever saw. They paint their faces red, black and blue; wear shell ornaments in their ears, nose and some in their under lip, and about their wrists and ankles. I have seen hundreds of them going about naked as they were born, except a square piece of pelt or cloth, about 9 or 9 inches each way, being around them. Yet they can build the best canoes in the world. I have seen some of their canoes 7 feet beam, and 50 feet long, in splendid proportion. They cut the tree down by fire, cut it to the required length the same way, and shape it, and hollow it out by fire and hot stones. I have myself measured trees 24 feet round, and there are trees in counterparts of the country 30 feet round, growing in rotation between the rocks—that is the kind of land we have got here. A man could not pick out a good farm to every 10 square miles of the country.

The English hardly keep their dominions here. In walking the street one may hear all the European tongues. Great numbers of South Sea Islanders, jargons, several native tribes, and lastly comes the long-tailed Celestials. About seventy-five per cent. of the population live in vessels, (that is, keep bachelor's hall)—and sleep in their blankets. A pirate will part with anything before his blanket. The man that can have a white shirt once a week is considered in good circumstances. We all wear flannel shirts here, and wash them ourselves. I am in a vessel with three others. We get along very well considering. What will be our fate. What [illegible] fate of British India with trembling in the balance by that skilful retrograde movement upon the deck of the homeward bound steamer, struck terror into the minds of the foe."

"As for the former hero, what honours could be equal to his transcendant merits? His military career has been distinguished by a happy union of valour and prudence above all praise. We know now that the Earl of Cardigan and General Ashburnham are England's two bravest soldiers, but of the two heroes, which is the better man?" The Roman Shaw in the Consul's car of Triumph, sentiently dinning in his ears, "remember thou art a man," was surely the prototype of this wicked Times; and there is but little fear of either of the above British heroes forgetting their humanity and deeming themselves gods, so long as the "Morning Post" furnishes their breakfast table with a daily copy to improve their digestion by seasoning their mutton chop and coffee.

Were the Parliament to set about reforms at all, they are no where wanted so much as in the "service," where nothing, from the food and apparel to the rewards of heroism of the army, is as it ought to be.—There is a very able article upon this subject in the Times from the pen of its military correspondent in Italy. By the way, talking of Italy reminds me of the appointment just made there by the French Emperor, of McMahon both Commander-in-Chief of the French army of occupation, and taking this together with the adjournment of the Congress into consideration, one is disposed to think that very much of what daily occurs has been forecasted in the astute mind of this little Frenchman. There can be no question but that from the first he had placed his eye upon Central Italy for his cousin; and that had Venetia been conquered from Austria, there would be no difficulty about the Legations, as in that case the required outlet to the Adriatic and the contemplated highway to Constantinople would have been secured. But failing of Venetia he desires the Romagna, and per fas aut ne fas shall have it.

The Essay already alluded to, was thrown out as a pecker, and if approved of by England will obviate a Congress.

POETS—THEIR POLITICS AND POETRY.

No. 1.

The following sentiment from the pen of Dr. John Porteus, author of "The Statesman," "Songs of Home and Happiness," is well deserving the attentive consideration of mankind. Hero worship and Despot and Priest worship have long enough engrossed the attention, long enough received the best interests of the world. Humanity slowly begins to assert their rights. Mankind are beginning to tire of paying homage to trinkets. The time for idolising Statesmen who ruin their country, and despots who butcher their species is at an end. Thought unconquerable as time, is spreading far and wide among the masses, dispelling the clouds of ignorance and superstition, and all the fantastic mockings and barbarities that hold the human mind in bondage. But secular knowledge moulded has not contributed to this end alone, No! The Bible "the best of books" is the only true leveller, the only successful agent in dispelling from our earth ignorance, superstition and woe. The supporters of despotic institutions, that in many countries have cursed and enslaved mankind, must neither allow them peaceably to melt away under the eradicating influence of knowledge, liberty and religion, or they will fall before the shattering bolt of indignation and scorn. Here is the Dr's. opinion of Despots and Warriors. (See his Statesman, Glasgow edition, 1858, Page 305.)

"——Whole Kingdoms fell
To sate the lust of power, more horrid still,
The foulest stain and scandal of our nature
Became its boast. One murder makes a hero.
Millions a villain. Princes were privileged
To kill, and numbers sanctified the crime.
Ah! why will despots forget that they are men?
And men, that they are brethren? why delight
In human sacrifices? why burst the ties
Of nature, that should knit their souls,
Together in one soft band of Unity and Love?
Yet still they breathe destruction—still go on,
Inhumanly ingenious to find out
New pains for life—new terrors for the grave,
Artificers of death. Still Despots dream
Of universal empire growing up
From universal ruin. Blast the design
Great God of Hearen, nor let Thy creatures fall
Unpitied victims at ambitions shrine.

This language is not more strong than appropriate, nor more severe than just. It is cheering to meet with such sentiments from a man such as Dr. Porteus—sentiments so freely expressed, and yet honest and true. He calls things by their right names, and is led by his regard for truth, to characterize Despots, and their blood stained satellites in true but uncourtly language as "Deaths artificers", as men "delighting in human sacrifice" as "Ruffians privileged to kill."

The whole compass of English poetry does not furnish a more powerful passage than that of Byron, where he describes the siege and sack of the City Ismail. The victorious Russians under General Suwarrow spill blood like water; the celebrated dispatch of that General to the Empress Catherine of Russia—a ruler who disgraced human nature. The poet desires to participate in, and commemorate the success of freedom, display a power seldom equalled by human genius.

"The town was taken whither he might Himself or Position, little mattered how,
His stubborn ruler was no future shield,
Ismail no more! the crescent silver bow
Sunk and the crimson cross glar'd o'er the field,
But red with no redeeming gard,
The glow of burning steeple, like moonlight on the water
Was imaged back in blood—the sea of slaughter."

Posterity will wonder that a people calling themselves Christian, free and enlightened, could submit to the absurd, and cruel policy that blackens the history of the 17th, 18th and 19th centuries, and not have struggled a hundred times more earnestly to resist the oppressed usurpations of the Hereditary sentiment in their efforts to overthrow despotism.

Contemplate for a moment the fate of tyrants, and the shortness of their power. Raised to a giddy height, they look at society, but cannot avoid its throw. Behold that restless spirit, the prophets of Europe, with their thrones already tumbling about their ears, and their crowns in the mire of the earthquake. Hide in the caves of the volcano, Napoleon the Great, of Despotism, and its fall.

"Here all the mighty troublers of the earth,
Who sate to sovereign rule, their seas of blood;
The oppressive, sturdy man-destroying villains,
Who ravaged kingdoms, and laid empires waste;
And in the cruel wantonness of power
Thin'd States of half their people, and grew up
To want the rest; now, like a storm that's spent
Lie hushed, and meanly sneak behind the covert;
Vain thought! to hide them from the general scorn,
That haunts and dogs them like an injured ghost
Implacable,—Here too the petty tyrant
Whose scanty domain's geographer ne'er notic'd
And well for neighb'ring grounds, of arm as short,
Who fixed his iron talon on the poor,
And gripp'd them like some lordly beast of prey—
Deaf to the forceful cries of gnawing hunger
And piteous plaintive voice of misery,
(As if a slave was not a shred of nature,
Of the same common nature as his lord.)
How tame and humble, like a child that's whipp'd—
Shakes hands with dust and calls the worm his kinsman
Nor pleads his rank, and birthright, underground
Precedency's a jest: Vassal and Lord
Grossly familiar, side by side consume."

Arrival of the "Nova Scotian."

PROPOSED SETTLEMENT OF ITALY.

Portland, January 28.

The Nova Scotian, from Liverpool on the 11th, and from Queenston on the 12th, arrived at 10½ o'clock this morning.

THE CONGRESS.

A Paris despatch says it was becoming every day more doubtful whether Congress would assemble; and the Paris correspondent of the London Times says there were many indications that the chances of Congress meeting were of a most shadowy kind. A French journal, the Opinion Nationale, which was supposed to speak with some authority, believes if Italy decided for the annexation of the north and centre of the Italian Peninsula, England would gladly accept the combination, whilst France would accept it with still greater eagerness on the condition that Savoy and Nice should be restored to her. The Opinion does not anticipate that the Cabinet of Turin would object, and after arguing that neither Austria, Russia, nor Prussia have power, will, or right to interfere, says it is assured that this combination is seriously entertained by the Governments of London and Paris.

GREAT BRITAIN

The funeral of Lord Macaulay took place at Westminister Abby on the 9th inst. His remains were interred at Poets' Corner, in the midst of many of England's most distinguished authors. Among the pall-bearers were the Lord Chancellor, the Speaker of the House of Commons Lord John Russell, Earl of Carlisle, &c.; and among those present were many men of eminence both in politics and literature. The funeral was essentially private, and although divested of all pomp, the ceremony was very impressive.

The Earl of Clarendon had been making a speech highly eulogistic of the Volunteer Rifle movement. He declared that the movement, although in its infancy had produced most salutary effects throughout Europe, and he believed it would ultimately render invasion impossible.

An election at Reading has resulted in the choice of another Jew, Mr. Goldsmidt, as a member of Parliament.

Large Papal demonstrations, presided over by Dr. Cullen, were held at Dublin, but are represented to have been a failure.

The English papers had not said much in regard to the President's message. The whole document only reached London the day before the steamer sailed, although a brief telegraphic summary from Queenstown had been previously published.

The London Daily News, commenting on this summary, says:—There appears no reason to complain of the manner in which the President deals with the general relations between England and the United States.

In the Times' city article it is remarked that the President's recommendation that the military force be employed against Mexico, exercised no sustained influence on the Mexican stock, owing to the knowledge that the matter does not rest in any degree on the will of the President.

The Manchester Guardian does not approve of the manner in which the President has treated the San Juan dispute. It thinks he ought to have explicitly disapproved of Harney's proceedings, although it regards the praise accorded to the British Admiral, as by implication a most severe censure on Harney.

The other prominent provincial journals somewhat qualify the praise they accord the document.

The London Herald city article remarks that the message in its financial aspect, was not regarded as of a hopeful character, especially in reference to any deficiency which might lead to an increase in import duties.

FRANCE.

Lord Cowly has returned to Paris. The Patrie says his mission to London was truly one of importance. He is represented by one authority to have announced that Walewski's retirement very materially facilitated the relations between the cabinets of France and England.

M. Thouvenel the new Foreign minister was expected to reach Paris about the 19th.

Count Lallemand had been appointed to the charge de affaires, ad interim at Constantinople. He was first secretary under Thouvenel.

It was reported that the Duc de Grammont would be removed from Rome to Constantinople, and that Carrobert would probably go to Rome in Ambassador and commander of the French army.

In Paris the appointment of McMahon to the command of the French army in Italy numbering 50,000 men, was regarded as a sign of warlike intentions.

A Synod is summoned with the English Church in Paris, which has been open for two years, had been summarily closed by the French authorities—it is believed, on account of a short service having been given in French for the benefit of the children of British subjects who do not understand English.

The Paris flour market dull, but prices not reduced. Wheat also dull, rather lower for inferior.

The Paris correspondent of the Times says, that a company consisting of eight or ten principal ship owners of Marseilles, had just been established under the name of M. M. Sicard & Co., and had purchased from the company of the Maritime Canal of Nicaragua, the lands dependent on the canal which form part of the concession which the canal company had obtained, and Sicard & Co., proposed to turn to account the metallic deposits which the lands contain, to cut down timber, and to establish European colonies. They have already sent to Nicaragua from Marseilles two vessels with 130 persons, engineers, chemists and workmen of different trades. It was said that the company had besides engaged a number of railway labourers to execute the railroad on the Isthmus of Biran, which separates Lake Nicaragua from the Pacific.

LATEST.

Rumours from Paris say that Carrobert was not going to Rome as successor to the Duc de Grammont, but will carry to the Papal Government propositions which, if rejected, would be followed by an order for the evacuation of Rome by the French troops. All sorts of reports were current as to the relations of France and Rome, but they were very contradictory, and wholly unreliable.

SPAIN AND MOROCCO.

The Spanish loss in the action at Costelligos, was 72 killed and 481 wounded.

The Spanish were attacked in the valley of Negro, on the 4th of January, by 25 Moorish cavalry and 15 infantry. They were dispersed by the Spanish who had 5 killed and 18 wounded. The health of the troops at the encampment of Serallo is improving.

ITALY.

The news of Walewski's resignation produced very painful impressions on the Pope. He called together the principal members of the sacred College, and declared to them he would never fail in the mission which God had intrusted to him, and that like his predecessor, Pius the 7th, he would rather suffer exile and even martyrdom.

It is said that France supports the protest of Piedmont against the enlistment of foreigners for the Papal army, and particularly against the wholesale introduction of Austrian recruits into Ancona.

The Theatres of Venice, in which were political demonstrations, were no more visited by the inhabitants, and had been closed.

Letters from Genoa speak of the probabilities of hostilities in Italy. It was believed that the Papal troops, reinforced by Austrians, would enter the Legations, and in that case, Sardinia would send a force to the aid of the Roman insurgents.

It is reported that the King of Naples is largely increasing his army.

The Pope is said to have addressed another note to all Catholic powers, except Sardinia.

Rumours have been current of the intention on the part of the Pope of Rome, but the Paris Patrie gives a denial to the report.

AUSTRIA.

Charges were rife against Austria of disguised interrention in Italy.

Le Nord directs attention to the recruiting going on in Vienna for the Pontifical army, under the eyes of the Austrian government. An Austrian General directs operations. They choose the best soldiers disbanded on account of reducing their own army and most able officers, whose services are now available in consequence of peace. it is just as if they formed an auxiliary corps of elite of their veteran troops and transformed them by mere change of uniform into an army of the Pope. Le Nord adds that the conduct of the Cabinet at Vienna on this occasion is not merely dishonourable—it entails serious dangers to peace, and on Austria herself, by breaking her word. Austria tears up the preliminaries of Villafranca and treaty of Zurich, and in her turn frees France from engagements entered into by Napoleon respecting the restoration of the Dukes and their reserved rights.—The Austrian Government had ordered Prince Metternich to declare to the French Cabinet that it would decline to enter into negotiations on any other basis than the agreement of Villafranca or the treaty of Zurich.

INDIA AND CHINA.

Trieste despatches give additional news under date Calcutta, Dec. 8th; and Canton, Nov. 26th. The treaty between the United States and China has been put in force. Part of the English troops designed for operations against China, had already left for the North.

Indian despatches announce that Jung Bathodor was operating against the rebels in Peri.

The submarine cable had been successfully laid between Singapore and Batavia. Order has been re-established at Sarawak.

The new Canadian loan closed at about 3 premium. Applications for it were equal to 22 millions sterling—nearly eight times the amount.

LATEST.

The Duke of Grammont has demanded to be released from his functions as French Ambassador at the Papal Court.

Active preparations are being made for the execution of the Suez Canal.

The Univers is the only party allowed to publish the Pope's discourse, the impression produced by the Imperial missive being generally regarded favourably at Paris, and it produced nearly as much sensation as the pamphlet.

The agitation against the Concordat is increasing at Badop, but the dpt have not power to declare a treaty with all Austria. The public openly speak of the propriety of selling Venetia.

THE INTER-COLONIAL RAILROAD.

From the Miramichi Gleaner.

The New Brunswicker after having copied extracts from the Hon. Mr. Tessier's letter on the Railway, makes the following comments thereon:—

"It thus appears that Mr. Tessier has himself visited during the past season, the line of the country between the River St. Lawrence and the Restigouche, of which he speaks so favorably.

"It is quite certain, at present, that if Her Majesty's Government should be induced to aid the construction of the great Inter-colonial Railway, it will only be in consideration of its being built on the route known as Major Robinson's line, as by that route, the mails, the military and military stores, would be most safely transported to and from Canada. The refusal during the Crimean war, to allow military stores to be sent from Quebec to Portland, by railway to be sent thence to England was a very significant act on the part of the U. States, and one very lately at the right time to induce the British Government, by a postal and military subsidy, to give such support to the undertaking as will enable these Provinces to carry it to a successful completion."

A late number of the Quebec Chronicle contains two letters from correspondents, in answer to Mr. Tessier. One bears the signature of Mr. A. Wallace, Provincial Surveyor; another that of Mr. James Tibbits. They both advocate the "Valley route." The principle arguments advanced by these writers are—it is shorter—that the Canadian mail steamers can procure return cargoes of deals, and the Canadian people will have the sole furnishing of the lumbermen in the upper parts of the St. John, direct with all the supplies necessary to carry on their lumbering operations. How will this last argument suit the interests of the St. John and St. Andrew's merchants? In reviewing these letters the Editor of the Westmoreland Times remarks as follows:

"In speaking of the harbor of St. Andrew's, the writer is evidently at fault. He says:—'The oldest inhabitant never saw the harbor frozen.' This is not the case; the harbor is frequently frozen, and besides, it is much too shallow for such vessels as are now employed to do the carrying trade, and unless deepened at a very great cost, the writer will never see one of the Canadian steamers taking in a cargo there. In a word, the harbour of St. John is the only harbor in the Province that will answer the purpose, and this will be easily seen when the matter comes to be determined on.—This is the alternative, and beyond it the Canadians cannot go.

"It will be observed that the writer's remarks are based entirely upon the supposition that this route is to be carried without the aid of the British Government, when he says—"If the Home Government wish us to take the northern route, after leaving us to our own resources, to build the longest Trunk Road in the world, not to speak of the biggest bridge, let them pay for it." This is quite correct; but for all this, if it were possible to get the Home Government fairly enlisted in the enterprise, we feel just as certain now as ever we did, that the northern route, according to Major Robinson's survey, would be the line to be built. The route proposed by the Canadians is certainly the best and cheapest for commercial purposes and peaceable times; but for a great military highway, and a protection to the colonies in case of trouble, the northern is the only safe route to be adopted, be the cost what it may, or whoever has to pay the bill."

ENGLISH RAILWAYS.

The railways of Great Britain and Ireland, completed at the beginning of 1856, extended 8,054 miles, and more than enough of single rails were laid to make a belt around the globe. The cost of constructing these railways has been £286,000,000. The working stock comprises 5,000 locomotive engines and 150,000 carriages and trucks; and the coal consumed annually by the engines amounted to 2,000,000 tons, so that in every minute four tons of coal flashed into steam twenty tons of water.—In a single year, there were 111 millions of passengers conveyed on railways, each passenger travelling on average of twelve miles. The receipts during the year amounted to £20,215,000; and there was no instance on record in which the receipts of a railway had not been of continuous growth, even where portions of the traffic had been abstracted by new lines. The wear and tear of the railways was, at the same time, enormous. For instance, twenty thousand tons of iron rails required to be annually replaced, and twenty six millions of wooden sleepers perished in the same time. To supply this number of sleepers, three hundred thousand trees were felled, the growth of which would require little less than five thousand acres of forest land. The cost of running was about fifteen pence per mile. Tunnels of a size never before contemplated have penetrated for miles through hard rocks, or through shifting clays and sands, in order to admit of these railways; embankments and viaducts have been raised and erected on a scale of magnificence surpassing any former similar works; bridges of various novel kinds, invented and constructed for the special occasions, carry the railways over straits of the sea, through gigantic tubes—across rivers, suspended from rods supported by ingeniously devised piers and girders—and over slanting roads on iron beams, or on brick arches built askew.

BRITISH COLONIZATION.

From the Times.

In the recent torrent of abuse which has been poured forth from so many vials on England and everything English, we have been over and over again reproached with the most greedy and boundless ambition and with a lust for dominion which nothing short of the empire of the whole world can satiate. Robbers on land, pirates on the deep; crushing all rival interests by monopoly, and when the policy of monopoly is worn out, crushing all rival interests still more successfully by free trade; plundering India, seeking for a footing in China, first exhausting then deserting the West Indies,—no object is too large for the ambition or too small for the cupidity of perfidious Albion. The same maw that has swallowed up the empire of the Great Mogul can condescend to make a meal on such petty dainties as Gibraltar, Malta, Corfu, and the singularly hard and dry morsel of Perim. It is in vain we protest, that if our censors have not outlived the illusions of territorial ambition, at any rate we have. Our censors do not believe in such moderation, probably because they feel incapable of it themselves, and cannot imagine how we can be proof of temptation which to them would be perfectly irresistible. When France is lavishing her millions of treasure and thousands of valuable lives to add to her dominion the poor and sandy wastes of North Africa, or to subdue the bloodthirsty savages who crowd her possessions o the South Pacific; when Spain, after having lost during the present century the whole continent of South America, and no inconsiderable portion of the North, is seeking to indemnify herself by a raid on the barbarous border of Mauritania; when Austria, with a bankrupt treasury and half a dozen provinces on the point of rebellion, prefers to encounter the ruin which stares her in the face rather than abandon the alien province of Venetia, the revenues of which is quite unequal to its vast military expenses—how can France, Spain or Austria believe us when we tell them that we're sick of territorial acquisition, that we unwillingly diminish the limits of our sway, and that we hold our vast territories in a very different spirit from that in which our ancestors acquired them?

Yet we ought to be believed notwithstanding. We disclaim conquest, not from any particular disinterestedness, but because we have discovered a simpler, a surer, and a more innocent way to national prosperity. We are the fortunate possessors of an art of which, although we make it no secret, no other nation has proved able to avail itself. We have shown that we can conquer, but so in its turn has every people in Europe, from Sweden in the north to Spain in the south. But that which we have done, and which no other nation since the days of ancient Greece has been able to do, to raise up in distant lands communities which, secure under the ægis of our power from invasion or insult, devote their whole energies to the arts of peace, and govern themselves by spontaneous choice, according to the laws and institutions of the parent State. At a very small expense at all of blood, we have placed in the Northern and Southern Temperate Zones numerous communities whose free commerce repays us one hundred fold the expenses of their foundation, whose broad lands offer an asylum to men whose enterprising spirit is discontented with the slow progress that can be made in an old and thickly populated country, and whose successful settlers, returning home with accumulated wealth, very perceptibly increase the riches of the mother country. Why should we embark in the uncertainties of war when we can secure such peaceful yet glorious triumphs as these? Well may we discard all monopolies in trade so long as we contrive to maintain the monopoly of the art of colonizing which is better than the art of producing wealth, since it is the art of planting communities who will produce it for us in the shortest time, because under the most favorable circumstances.—It is not difficult to see what are the conditions of success in this pursuit, the possession of which has raised us so far above the competition of the other European Powers. Having ourselves made every possible mistake in the art of colonization, we have gradually come to establish a number of rules by which we guide our own operations, and by which the operations of no other European Power are guided. We have tried colonization both in tropical and temperate latitudes, and, having experience of both, we have come to the conclusion that the only colonies we ought to plant for the future are those favorable in climate and position to the multiplication of our own race and the healthful diffusion of our own institutions. By overlooking this principle Holland, Spain, France, and Denmark, have encumbered themselves with possessions which afford no permanent home for their European inhabitants, which are like our Indian Empire, a constant drain on our resources, without possessing, like our Indian Empire, a vast semi-civilized population, whose commerce may reward them for the toils of Government. We have at last convinced ourselves that the best way to colonise is to make the colony an eligible place of residence for English men and women, and that not only as regards climate, but laws, institutions and habits. We have given to our colonies the means of making such laws as please them, we have relieved them from all commercial restraints, and in a great measure from the necessity of incurring expenditure for self defence. With the English army and navy to defend them from attack, they are placed in a position as happy and as prosperous as ever fell to the lot of any large number of the human race. We have given them, besides, perfect religious equality. What wonder then, if our colonies have been able so far to outstrip communities nursed in the doctrines of monopoly, of centralizing interference, and of intellectual and religious subservience?

A Pumpkin Puff.

There are always some people who easily tell
A fib or two;
About monstrous vegetables;
And their corn and their pumpkins—their family circle—
Budgets all the rest of creation.

We were noticing statements last week and before,
Of a turnip too big to be eaten,—
Of potatoes, two bushels at least to each hill,
And of beets not at all to be beaten.

We are always unwilling to publish a puff,
As such fellows are trying to blow it;
But we thought that for once we would give them enough,
With the help of our artist and poet.

And we now are decided to tell a great yarn,
One awful exaggeration,—
And our artist has drawn it as big as a barn,
"Some pumpkin" above the whole nation.

We persuaded our poet the falsehood to tell
Of a pumpkin full fifteen feet through,
Which it took two oxen, one horse and one mule,
To remove from the field where it grew.

Our poet remembers: it was last September—
And the feats in his memory are clinging—
The oxen were drawing, the boys were hurrahing,
And this is the song they were singing:

"Hail to the nitrogen, phosphorus, oxygen!
Furnishing all the components required,
Rendering soils most completely adapted
To raising such pumpkins as must be admired.

"Professor Puff has a most capital warehouse,
For selling new patents and fixing old soils:
It was there that I bought the ingredients I sought;
And I now raise "some pumpkins" without any toils.

"The seed is for sale at Professors Puff's Warehouse—
The Patent Progressive Primarius seed.
Send for a circular: get the certificates.
The thing is discovered which all farmers need.

"All crops, at all seasons, without rhyme or reason,
Will grow, if you only Professor Puff try
Ammonia, guano, and other progressives,
Will do the thing up, if you only will buy.

"I can truly advise that friend Puff analyze
The soil of each farm, and find out what it needs,
For twenty-five dollars; a good letter follows,
Telling how the good farmer completely succeeds.

"His salt and lime mixture is a most complete fixture.
Converting the peat into chloride of lime:
The sugar-cane refuse made into phosphate
Nitrogenous phosphate—is something sublime.

"Sublime or ridiculous, how he does tickle us!
Ravichers phosphatic will do the thing clean:
Of potash progressive, the fruits are excessive,
And need Gibb's rotary digging machine.

"Long may Columbia raise, without number,
The fruits of improved superphosphate of lime;
Its products extreme will hold up to esteem
Professor Puff's name to the end of all time."

PHONOGRAPHY, or WRITING BY SOUND!!

PHONOGRAPHY was invented by ISAAC PITMAN, of Bath, England, in the year 1837. It is the most simple, most natural, most rapid, and most easily learned system of writing which has ever been, or ever can be invented.

During the past fifteen years, hundreds of thousands of persons, in England and America, in both public and private life, have learned to write Phonography, and thousands of social and business letters annually pass through the post office.

Nor is the great popularity to be wondered at. The present system of writing is exceedingly cumbersome, and totally unworthy these days of progress and invention. Phonography is equally as legible, can be learned in one twentieth the time, and can be written six times as fast! In other words, the labor of six days can be performed in one—one man can do the work of SIX! So simple is the system, too, that a person may learn to write it slowly, in a couple of hours. An hour's daily practice for a few weeks will enable any person to write Phonography with certainty, and with some degree of freedom. The same amount of practice continued for six months will enable a person to take reports of speeches lectures, sermons, or conversation, and to read them with accuracy.

The late Hon. Thos. H. Benton, upon being presented with a verbatim report of one of his masterly speeches, taken by a little boy only twelve years of age, said: "Had this art been known 40 years ago it would have saved me 20 years hard labor." The learned senator spoke but a portion of the truth. What long-hand requires six years to accomplish, Phonography will perform in one.

To clergymen, Editors, Physicians, Lawyers, Secretaries, Conveyancers, Law and Medical Students, Lecturers, Printers, School Teachers, a Merchants, School Boys and Girls, a knowledge of Phonography is of vast utility. In fact there is no profession or calling in which it is not useful, and no young man's education can be considered complete without it.

During the past 9 months hundreds of persons in Canada, of every pursuit in life, have acquired the Art, from many of whom the subscriber has received really-written phonographic letters, expressive of their delight with the attainment, and the extraordinary ease with which they have acquired it.

For the purpose of aiding in the dissemination of so important a reform in his own country, the subscriber is now prepared to supply all who apply, with the MANUEL OF PHONOGRAPHY, and the PHONOGRAPHIC COPY BOOK, sent by mail to any part of the Province, postage pre-paid, for the small sum of ☞ ONE DOLLAR.

Anybody and everybody, who can learn anything, can learn PHONOGRAPHY from the MANUAL without other assistance. Those who wish to be able to put their thoughts to paper at the rate of from 100 to 250 words per minute, should send for the above-mentioned works at once. The instruction given by the Manual is as plain as A. B. C., and ten times as easy to understand.

STARTLING BUT TRUE! SURVIVE OR PERISH.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.

The history of this great remedy is the most wonderful medical revelation that the world has ever known. It is not a history written by one man, or even derived from the experience of one nation, but consists of a compilation of testimonials from the sick of every country—a record, the like of which has never been adduced in favour of any discovery or invention since time began.

SERIOUS DISORDERS.

In whatever form disease attacks the liver, it is repelled and exterminated by this searching, painless and irresistible corrective.

Let the sick whom the faculty have abandoned resort with confidence to this antibilious agent, and a restoration to health and activity will be the unvarying result.

DYSPEPSIA.

The great scourge of this continent yields quickly to a course of these antiseptic Pills and the digestive organs are restored to their proper tone; no matter in what hideous shape this hydra of disease exhibits itself, this searching and unerring remedy disperses it from the patient's system.

GENERAL DEBILITY AND WEAKNESS.

From whatever cause, LOWNESS OF SPIRITS, and all other signs of a diseased liver, and other disorganization of the system, vanish under the eradicating influence of this all powerful antiseptic and detergent remedy.

SICKLY FEMALES

Should lose no time in trying a few doses of this regulating and renovating remedy; whatever may be their complaint, it can be taken with safety in all periodical and other disorganizations; its effect is all but miraculous.

Holloway's Pills are the best remedy known in the world for the following diseases:

Asthma,	Headaches,
Bowel Complaints,	Indigestion,
Coughs,	Influenza,
Colds,	Inflammation,
Chest Diseases,	Inward Weakness
Costiveness,	Liver Complaints,
Dyspepsia,	Lowness of Spirits,
Diarrhœa,	Piles.
Dropsy,	Stone and Gravel,
Debility,	Secondary Symptoms,
Fever and Ague,	Venereal Affections.
Female Complaints,	Worms of all kinds.

☞ CAUTION—None are genuine unless the words "Holloway, New York and London," are discernible as a Water-mark in every leaf of the book of directions around each pot or box; the same may be plainly seen by holding the leaf to the light. A handsome reward will be given to any one rendering such information as may lead to the detection of any party or parties counterfeiting the medicines or vending the same, knowing them to be spurious.

. Sold at the Manufactory of Professor Holloway, 80 Maiden Lane, New York, and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicine throughout the United States and the civilized world, in boxes at 25 cents, 63 cents and $1 each.

☞ There is considerable saving by taking the larger sizes.

N. B.—Directions for the guidance of patients in every disorder are affixed to each box.

PRACTICAL EXPERIENCE,
BETTER THAN
EXPERIMENTAL SCIENCE.

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.

CONSOLATION FOR THE SUFFERING.

Nearly fifty years continual use in every part of the habitable globe, amongst the savage and the civilized alike, has proved that simple eruptions, open sores, hard tumors, scrofulous developments of all kinds, abscesses, cancers, old wounds, and, in one word, every species of inflammation and suppuration, whether in the skin, the flesh, the glands, or among the muscles, can be arrested and permanently cured, without danger, by rubbing in and using as a dressing, this inestimable Ointment.

SCROFULA, ERYSIPLAS, AND SALT RHEUM, ERUPTIONS OF THE SKIN, PILES, AND FESTULA,

No remedy has ever done so much for the cure of diseases of the Skin, whatever form they may assume, as this Ointment. No case of Salt Rheum, Scurvy, Sore Heads, Scrofula or Erysiplas, can long withstand its influence.

BAD LEGS, OLD SORES, ULCERS, &c.

Cases of many years standing that have pertinaciously refused to yield to any other remedy or treatment, have invariably succumbed to a few applications of this powerful unguent.

Arising from a bad state of the blood or chronic disease, are eradicated, and a clear as a transparent surface regained by the restorative action of this Ointment. It surpasses many of the cosmetics and other toilet appliances in its power to dispel rashes and other disfigurements of the face.

Every form and feature of these prevalent and stubborn disorders is eradicated locally and entirely by the use of this emollient; warm fomentations should precede its application. Its healthy qualities will be found to be thorough and invariable.

Both the Ointment and Pills will be used in the following cases:

Bunions,	Skin Diseases,
Burns,	Swelled Glands,
Chapped Hands,	Sore Legs,
Chilblains,	Sore Breasts,
Fistula,	Sore Heads
Gout,	Sore Throats,
Lumbago,	Sores of all kinds,
Mercurial Eruptions,	Sprains,
Piles,	Stiff Joints,
Rheumatism,	Tetter,
Ringworm,	Ulcers,
Salt Rheums,	Venereal Sores,
Scalds,	Wounds of all kinds.

☞ CAUTION!—None are genuine unless the words "Holloway, New York and London" are discernible as a Water-mark in every leaf of the book of directions around each pot or box; the same may be plainly seen by holding the leaf to the light. A handsome reward will be given to any one rendering such information as may lead to the detection of any party or parties counterfeiting or vending the same, knowing them to be spurious.

. Sold at the manufactory of Professor Holloway, 80 Maiden Lane, New York, and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicine throughout the United States and the civilized world, in pots at 25 cents, 63 cents, and $1 each.

It has (with business men generally, and especially with the best Merchants of both Provinces) become so great a favorite, that it is now acknowledged to be THE Business Hotel of Montreal. To meet the extensive increase, during the last year in the business of the house, the proprietor has built a large addition. The Dining Room has been extended and made more commodious; there have been completed in the new wing, a great number of well-ventilated sleeping rooms; and the House throughout has been refitted, and now contains many improvements not surpassed, if not excelled by any hotel in the city. The whole of the beds have, at a great expense, been furnished with NEW SPRING MATTRASSES. ADDRESS TO THE PLAGIARIST.

The vilest thief that roams the earth,
The plagiarist I call;
There is no man of human birth,
Can e'er such falsehood's path.

He'll steal and publish as his own
The works of other men,
Tho' on a page he may be known,
In city, town or glen.

That he's a man of high renown,
He'd make us all believe,
And through the public press in town,
He'll publish what he'll thieve.

What other thief could be so bold,
What other thief so mean,—
What bolder liar can man behold?
There's none on earth I ween.

May scorn's blazes night and day,
Be given him as praise,
And may his thiefs upon him prey,
And shorten half his days.

May every wretched seame of life,
On earth ever meet his view,
And he unblessed with friends and wife,
And name be to him true.

May he be parch'd and die of thirst,
Beside some river's brink,
And may his tongue for water burst
And yet have none to drink.

Deer Douglass, The Warlock.

AN AULD WIFE'S CRACK.

Ay, but ye're wise, and wiser far than we,
Or maist part o' the parish tells a lee,
Of what kind wisdom, Beadsy, think ye I'm possess'd.
That lifts my character, see far, above the rest?
The word that gangs, how sune are wise and fell,
Ye'd maybe tak it ill if I should tell.

Gentle Shepherd.

In my young days, there was a man they ca'd Deer Douglass lived at place they ca' the Clayholes o' Stranraer, and it was allowed that if ever there was a Warlock on this earth he was one. He was a kind o' by-ordinar man in a' things frae the very first. When he was a bit callan herding his father's kye, he used tae cuthra hale days whittling sticks wi' his knife, and thinking a' sorts o' gairly wirlins o' wind mills and water mills, and [illegible] Syne, as he grew up he made for himself turning-loom, out o' his ain head, and twenty a' sorts o' boards and cups, and queer things for the gentry, and they gae him a heatle o' siller for them. When he came to mak's estate he took this place at the Clayholes, and commenced the wright business, making chairs and tables and wood-work. Now, when ony thing by ordinar was wanted about town, just send for Deer Douglass and he wad make it for ye. How he came by this extraordinar knowledge gude only knows; but it was allowed that his work was very perfect, mair indeed than many ane's who had said a lang seven years' apprenticeship, and he had nairdanes, that is, cases to carry this world frae us. But it wanna till about the time that Deary had grown mon-mable, and was begun to gae courting the lasses, that it was fairly found that he was a warlock. There was a brow lass in the town they ca'd Tibby Hawkins—I hae seen the wratten mysel many a time, but ye could easily see she had been a right bleezer o' her young days, and takin enough to a mislaird's ee. Weel it ance fell out that Deer cam a-courting to Tibby, and it likewise was fell out that in the course o' their courtship Tibby, very thoughtlessly, gaid Deer a thrawn kind o' a slight, as lasses will sometimes do even to the lads that they're maist fond of. But mark the upshot! It was na long after that maybe no mair nor ten days, till the lass lost the power o' baith her legs, a' in an instant, and it was allooged that if had been Deer Douglass that brought it on her, as if he had read in his heart "gae ye wimes be my wife ye shanna be the wife o' ony ither," at least it was allowed that if that wasna the way o't, there could be nae ither reasonable cause nae, and for a queerly like her losing the power o' her legs in a night's time. Mair than that, I've heard said that she had two sisters living south in the south, at Kirkmichan, and that they baith lost the power o' their legs on the very same night. But of the truth of this part of the story I canna be nae positive, having nae acquaintance o' ony body in that quarter. I heard bonny Tibbie Hawkins that lived in Stranraer wast enough though. She gat'er gait a mon a' her days, but lived in a fine oot-house by hersell, and was glad of ony bit house like me to ren an errand for her. Many a time she has said to me "Jessie, my Jessie, dinna play wi' that lassie Douglass—they're no canny thae Douglasses. I was since a bonny young maiden like yoursel but ye see what it is noo, alas, themselves edging they hae made Puirs. O, for my sake beware o' them Douglasses."

But to gang straight through wi' my story. After that affair on Tibby Hawkins had gaen o'er bonny the town's talk, Deer, without loss of time, gaes off and deeds up wi' anither lass. They ca'ed her ——— but I dinnamember her maiden name. She maybe wasna just sae weel faur'd as Tibbie Hawkins, but she was o' gentler kind, and had gotten good schooling. It was allowed that the reason why he married Deer Douglass afore ony ither was just to a embridge upon her that he couldna do ony ither thing to her. At the ordinar day [illegible] and in gaes the weight o' mother. Na, the minister himself gaes gaed nae far to say that his name shouldna gae down for ages to come as Deer Douglass, and that Deer Douglass himself—Warlock or no warlock, there's little doubt he was the means of saving o' their lives that day, and as was natural, there followed a good deal o' town's talk anent the way he had come ashore from the boat. Many a ane had their ain opinion, and maybe some ventured ane for as to being up the auld story of Tibby Hawkins again. Now this was carried to the minister, as mairt clashes were, and he sent for a number of as town's folk to the manse and explained to us that Deer Douglass wasna a warlock ava, but only a very great [illegible]. What that was we didna weel understand, but it was very plain that Deer Douglass was a by-ordinar kind of man, and had power to do as a battle of ill, if he had only a mind to do't. Deer Douglass continued to be just as much feared by his new friend as ever he was by us auld anes.

I couldna gang through a' the stories that I hae heard anent Deer Douglass, and the wonderfu' things that he did—though I daresay I hae heard maist fifth of them twenty times over—nae I'll just finish off wi' ane about his son—that's young Deer, ken. We were a' hames in the south thegither at Lochwood, and ae day we were playing on the scale-hill—that is a high knowe at the back of the scales, where the minister used to ca' us out like a flock o' sheep to play, and when he wanted us he would just come to the door and whistle, and we could hear him. Young Deer Douglass had a brisk spirity callan—the very captain o' the boys in the scale, and the ane that led thegither in a' their pranks. Those was the auld days but he was in nearly splendid order, Na, the minister himself gaed nae far to say that his name shouldna gae down for ages to come as Deer Douglass, ava, but just Deer Davil; which saying forced on a' greatly. Weel this day that I'm gaen to speak of, the laddies were playing on the scale-hill and Deer he cries "canna a' hae'd Wallace yon magic," ane wa a' fairly fired him up to the top of the scale-hill, and he stood in the midst—the laddies striking a wride rung about him, and us hames looking through between them. And first Deer made ten or three grimaces faces, turning up the whites of his e'en and thrusting out his tongue; and then he gae himself a dirle, just as ye see a dog do when he comes out of the water, and when he gat'd done I—he gae a great loun, and he loup clean out of the circle, without ane opposite or behind. A bonnie of them! Od! he was a fearfu' determined young Deer. It was thought after when he was he married after a wife he would for ever gang his father. And indeed so he did. As he grew up he turned out a very great scholar, and was very clever at his father's business, but nothing would suit him when at Hill Vieu, but he gang to America. He considered himself to my at his father that the newer district o' place for the like of them are. Nae doubt they were right and weel learn in Economy, and lucky it was, very great reason—though they needed to thrive weel enough for they had but little reasonable to expect after the [illegible] death, got better on to America, my Jessie, than ever they could hae done at hame. I'm informed a post o' his have fa' e'en that lost bodies there determined on as doctor. I wonder if that when the Douglasses are gone away. They gaen away under o' charge the gentry; [illegible] that and [illegible] there; I left in town's dell that before the manse of having their grand [illegible] and doubt, that the [illegible] [illegible] and a fair family of the [illegible]

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

Erasmus Wilson, Esq., F.R.S., Surgeon to the Queen's Private Household

LOUIS NAPOLEON'S VIEW OF THE EMPEROR.

AN ARTICLE OF IMPERIAL ORIGIN.

From the Paris Constitutionnel Jan. 31.

The Sovereign Pontiff has just addressed an encyclical letter to all the bishops. We at first doubted whether we were legally authorized to publish that document. The organic law which regulates the relationship of the political power of our country with the Court of Rome leaves no doubt upon this question and resolves it negatively. In fact, Article 1, of that law says:

"No bull, brief, rescript, decree, mandate, provision, signature serving as provision, nor other documents (expeditions) from the Court of Rome, even when only concerning private individuals, may be received, printed, or otherwise made public, without the permission of the Government."

This enactment is formal, and we could not have infringed it, had not the moderation and the toleration of the Administration thought fit to derogate from so absolute a prohibition. We were informed this evening, with our contemporaries, that we might reproduce the Pontifical letter without impropriety.

This letter is a declaration from the Head of the Church, addressed to his venerable brethren of the Episcopacy. On the first grounds, it imposes upon us a respect which we shall scrupulously observe.

But it does not concern questions of faith for the settlement of which the authority of the Pope is only absolute when conformable to the sacred canons, and in accord with the universal consent of the assembled Church.

A political question alone is here under consideration, and on this point the competency of the Court of Rome could not be admitted without disavowing all the traditions of the Church of France. The memorable declaration of 1682, to which the name of Bossuet is so gloriously attached, says, textually:

"That St. Peter and his successors, Vicars of Jesus Christ, and that the whole Church itself have only received power from God for spiritual things and which concern salvation, and not temporal and civil things."

Then, in the encyclical letter of the 19th of January it is the temporal sovereign who speaks in the name of a temporal interest, but in the forms and with the particular character which appertain to the head of the Church.

There is, then, here, an abuse of jurisdiction, which, without dispensing us from a respectful deference, cannot prevent a free judgment.

Let us not hesitate to express our full opinion.

The detractors of the Papacy have always reproached it for its efforts to overpass the spiritual domain which is exclusively its own. They have raised against it the minds of many independent men who refused their submission except in matters of faith. It was in wishing "to subject" according to the very terms of the decree of 1682, Kings and Sovereigns [illegible] that visible union was disputed from that unity of which Rome is the centre.

Times are changed, we are no longer in the age of [illegible] and our [illegible] would in vain look for such distractions over to arise from a passing misunderstanding [illegible]

It is impossible for us not to deplore the attitude which was here forced upon [illegible] under circumstances, when the spirit of examination appeared as if it ought to [illegible] well with the august character of the Holy Father. It is not sad to see in so grave a document an [illegible] on which we speak the eternal cause of the Church mixed up with and lowered by interests so little worthy of it, and associated with the fortunes of those Princes who, in Italy, only maintained themselves by the arms of Austria, and could not return there except at her back!

In fact, one of the reasons given in the letter of the Pope, for refusing the separation of the Romagna is, that he could not abdicate that portion of his territory without "detriment to the rights of the Princes of Italy, who have been unjustly deprived of their domains."

Here we have, then, the Head of the Church making himself, as in the days of Boniface VIII. and Innocent XII. the arbitrator of political Sovereignties! And mark it well! this theocratical arbitration, which in our day would be the most dangerous prerogative for the Papacy is, by a strange contrast, only the undeniable proof of its dependency; for, before as after the war of Italy, we find Rome bent under the influence of Austria—under that influence which Father Lacordaire so justly considered a cause of the decline and fall of the Holy See.

We should pity French Catholics who could not feel the sad position imposed by the papacy coming forward to restore against the popular will Princes who, having fallen of themselves, had no other refuge than the baggage train of Austrian. This position deserves the hopes of all those who have blessed in the Head of Christianity the union with the Head of Christianity reunion with the principle of his political power is union with regenerated Italy.

The encyclical letter will doubtless serve a rallying point for many opinions which have nothing [illegible] for Christian about them, but which will wrongly endeavour to abuse the authority of this document and its venerable [illegible]. We do not fear that they will succeed, for the policy of the Emperor cannot give occasion, we are certain, to any legitimate [illegible]. The Emperor inspired by a [illegible] which, for ten years has never failed until the present day, first compelled to the Pope reforms which might have saved the integrity of his dominions. When [illegible] considered the evil has [illegible] and saw it means no [illegible] pacifying hand took the population of the Romagna, unless compelling them by force.

The Emperor thought it was more [illegible] for the Pope to give the Romagnas than to conquer for it the rest of the land at the cost of the blood of the soldiers of the Eldest Son of the Church and [illegible]. Happily [illegible] to do so, and we may [illegible] that the [illegible] of France [illegible] into [illegible]

[illegible] to the right to do so, and we may [illegible] that the [illegible] of France [illegible] into [illegible]

[illegible] the Pope [illegible] the [illegible] of the Romagna [illegible] the [illegible] of the Romagnas [illegible] the [illegible] of the Romagnas [illegible] the [illegible] of the Romagnas

DESTRUCTION OF FORESTS.

Do our American farmers sensibly realize that the great majority of them are living the fourth year, and their successors, to have their former subject a good wood to shelter and fuel, in fifty years? I am led to such a conclusion when I compare the present condition of the heavy timber lands with that of forty-five and fifty years ago. Let them have the same treatment fifty years to come, and the words of the Prophet will be fulfilled! "The trees of the forest shall be so few in number that a child can write them!" Now, Messrs. Editors, would it be beneficial to a large portion of your readers, to have this subject a thoroughly investigated in the Rural—about how it is being done, and the best in the vicinity? To start the subject, I send you a few of my reflections and conclusions on this subject.

First.—How are timber lands likely to be made bare of timber? By continually pasturing them. In such woodlands the undergrowth has long disappeared, and much has insensibly decided to graze. This gives a good chance for the wind, when the leaves drop from the forest timber, to blow them into the hollows, or pile them up into heaps by old logs, or stony; then snug by the lodged among the timber, and lodge them in gullies, or over the brink of the ridges in windrows. Remains such woodlands, and where the leaves are carried off, the most of the timber is dying out fast. Why? Because sheep—it has become the most needful to graze, fit roots occupy the soil and collect most of the nutriment from the small amount of leaf mould and the roots of the timber are driven to the extent for support. The tops of the trees, of all sizes, are fast becoming dry, because the roots are robbed of their food they need to keep up a thrifty growth of timber.

Second.—What treatment should timber lands receive to give the most thrifty growth to the timber? This is the question that should be understood. I answer, stop pasturing them and let a thicket of underbrush start up. This is actually necessary for several reasons, to give a thrifty growth to the larger timber. It keeps a supply of young timber coming along to fill the place of the old that is decaying by age. A thicket of underbrush keeps the grass from growing, and high the forest leaves where they drop, keeping them spread in an even coat over the ground, preventing evaporation in the summer, and holding moisture more evenly in the soil. Examine the best spoils, and it is found filled with a thicket of small, thrown roots, close up to the dry leaves. Here is found the very nutriment needed to give a thrifty growth to the timber.—Correspondence Rural New Yorker.

SEA BIRDS.

The question is often asked where do sea birds obtain fresh water to slake their thirst but we have never seen it satisfactorily answered till a few days ago. An old captain says that he has frequently seen these birds at sea, far from any land that could furnish them water, hovering around and under a shore cloud, chattering like ducks on a hot day at a pond, and drinking in the drops of rain as they fall. They will smell a rain squall a hundred miles or even further off, and meet for it with inconceivable fleetness. How long can birds can live without water is only a matter of conjecture, but probably their powers of enduring thirst are increased by habit, and possibly they go without it for many days if not several weeks.—Hinsdale Advertiser.

THE STUDY OF STORMS.

A few weeks ago the British Association for the advancement of Science, passed a resolution praying the Board of Trade to consider the possibility of watching the rise, force, and direction of storms, and the means for sending, in case of sudden danger, a series of warning telegrams along the coast. A few days ago, at a meeting of the council of the association at Buckingham Palace, the Prince Consort in the chair, this resolution was again brought forward, and, after some debate, was referred as a special recommendation to the care of the Board of Trade.

MINERAL DISCOVERY.

A correspondent of the Brockville Recorder intimates that a very rich mine has lately been discovered in the front of Young C. W. The vein has already produced of very pure Nickel, and it is supposed that copper and even gold may be found in said mine. The mine is located on the farm belonging to Mr. Benjamin Hayle, and was discovered last summer by a very ingenious mineralogist, named W. Hardman. The work has been pursued to some extent lately, but will be properly opened the coming spring.

PHONOGRAPHY,
OR
WRITING BY SOUND!!

PHONOGRAPHY was invented by ISAAC PITMAN, of Bath, England, in the year 1837. It is the most simple, most natural, most rapid, and most easily learned system of writing which has ever been, or ever can be invented.

During the past fifteen years, hundreds of thousands of persons, in England and America, in both public and private life, have learned to write Phonography, and thousands of social and business letters annually pass through the post office.

Nor is the great popularity to be wondered at. The present system of writing is exceedingly cumbersome, and totally unworthy these days of progress and invention. Phonography is equally as legible, can be learned in one twentieth the time, and can be written six times as fast! In other words, the labor of six days can be performed in one—one man can do the work of six So simple is the system, too, that a person may learn to write it slowly, in a couple of hours. An hour's daily practice for a few weeks will enable any person to write Phonography with certainty, and with some degree of freedom. The same amount of practice continued for six months will enable a person to take reports of speeches lectures, sermons, or conversation, and to read them with accuracy.

The late Hon. Thos. H. Benton, upon being presented with a verbatim report of one of his masterly speeches, taken by a little boy only twelve years of age, said: "Had this art been known 40 years ago it would have saved me 30 years hard labor." The learned senator spoke but a portion of the truth. What long-hand requires six years to accomplish, Phonography will perform in one.

To clergymen, Editors, Physicians, Lawyers, Secretaries, Conveyancers, Law and Medical Students, Lecturers, Printers, School Teachers, Merchants, School Boys and Girls, a knowledge of Phonography is of vast utility. In fact there is no profession or calling in which it is not useful, and no young man's education can be considered complete without it.

During the past 9 months hundreds of persons in Canada, of every pursuit in life, have acquired the Art, from many of whom the subscriber has received neatly-written phonographic letters, expressive of their delight with the attainment, and the extraordinary ease with which they have acquired it.

For the purpose of enabling the [illegible] of so important a reform in his own country, the subscriber is now prepared to supply all who apply, with the MANUAL OF PHONOGRAPHY, and the PHONOGRAPHIC COPY BOOK, sent by mail to any part [illegible] the small sum of ☞ ONE DOLLAR.

Anybody and everybody, who can learn anything, can learn PHONOGRAPHY from the MANUAL without other assistance. Those who wish to be able to put their thoughts to paper at the rate of from 100 to 250 words per minute, should send for the above-mentioned works at once. The instruction given by the Manual is as plain as A. B. C., and ten times as easy to understand.

"THE CANADIAN PHONETIC PIONEER" is a Monthly Journal, devoted to the advocacy of the Reform. Price 25 cents per annum.

STARTLING BUT TRUE
SURVIVE OR PERISH.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.

The history of this great remedy is the most wonderful medical revelation that the world has ever known. It is not a history or feats by one man, or even derived from the experience of one nation, but consists of a concentration of testimonials from the dust of every quarter of the globe, the like of which has never been adduced in favour of any discovery or invention since time began.

BILIOUS DISORDERS.

In whatever form disease attacks the liver, it is regulated and exterminated by the concurring, judicious and irresistible operation of these purifying and irresistible remedies.

Let the sick whom the faculty have abandoned correct with confidence to this antidiluvian agent, and a restoration to health and entirety will be the unvarying result.

DYSPEPSIA.

The great scourge of this continent yields quickly to a course of these medicines. Pills cool the digestive organs are restored to their proper tone; no matter in what intricate shape this hydra of disease exhibits itself, this conquering and unerring remedy disperses it from the patient's system.

GENERAL DEBILITY AND WEAKNESS.

From whatever cause, however or remote, and all other signs of a diseased liver, and other disorganization of the system, vanish under the invigorating influences of this all powerful antiseptic and detergent remedy.

SICKLY FEMALES!

Should none else time in trying a few doses of this regulating and renovating remedy; whose ever may be their complaint, it can be taken with safety in all periodical and other disorganizations; its effect is all but miraculous.

Holloway's Pills are the best remedy known to the world for the following diseases:

Asthma,	Headaches,
Bowel Complaints,	Indigestion,
Coughs,	Jaundice,
Colds,	Inflammation,
Chest Diseases,	Inward Weakness
Constipation,	Liver Complaints,
Dysentery,	Lowness of Spirits,

Diarrhœa,	Stone and Gravel,
Dropsy,	Secondary Symptoms,
Debility,	Venereal Affections.
Fever and Ague,	Worms of all kinds.
Female Complaints,

☞ CAUTION!—None are genuine unless the words "Holloway, New York and London," are discernible as a Water-mark in every leaf of the book of directions around each pot or box; the same may be plainly seen by holding the leaf to the light. A handsome reward will be given to any one rendering such information as may lead to the detection of any party or parties counterfeiting the medicine or vending the same, knowing them to be spurious.

 Sold at the Manufactory of Professor HOLLOWAY, 80 Maiden Lane, New York, and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicine throughout the United States and the civilized world, in boxes at 25 cents, 63 cents and $1 each.

PRACTICAL EXPERIENCE,

EXPERIMENTAL SCIENCE.

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.

CONSOLATION FOR THE SUFFERING.

Nearly fifty years continual use in every part of the habitable globe, amongst the savage and the civilized alike, has proved that simple eruptions, open sores, hard tumors, scrofulous developments of all kinds, abscesses, cancers, old wounds, and, in one word, every species of inflammation and suppuration, whether in the skin, the flesh, the glands, or among the muscles, can be arrested and permanently cured, without danger, by rubbing in and using as a dressing, this inestimable Ointment.

SCROFULA, ERYSIPELAS, AND SALT RHEUM, ERUPTIONS OF THE SKIN, PILES, AND FISTULA.

No remedy has ever done so much for the cure of diseases of the Skin, whatever form they may assume, as this Ointment. No case of Salt Rheum, Scurvy, Sore Heads, Scrofula or Erysipelas, can long withstand its influence.

BAD LEGS, OLD SORES, ULCERS, &c.

Cases of many years standing that have pertinaciously refused to yield to any other remedy or treatment, have invariably succumbed to a few applications of this powerful ungnent.

Arising from a bad state of the blood or the most diseases, are eradicated, and a clear and transparent surface regained by the restorative action of this Ointment. It suppresses many of the connection and other infant complaints in the power to dispel rashes and other disfigurements of the face.

Every form and feature of these prevalent and stubborn disorders is eradicated locally and entirely by the use of this emollient; warm fomentations should precede its applications. In bursting qualities will be found to be thorough and invariable.

Both the Ointment and Pills will be used in the following cases:

Bunions,	Skin Diseases,
Burns,	Stiff Joints,
Chapped Hands,	Sore Legs,
Chilblains,	Sore, Scrofula,
Piles,	Sore Heads,
Gout,	Sore Throats,
Lumbago,	Sores of all kinds,
Mercurial Eruptions,	Scalds,
Ringworm,	Tetter,
Salt Rheum,	Ulcers,
Scalds,	Venereal Sores,
	Wounds of all kinds.

☞ CAUTION!—None are genuine unless the words "Holloway, New York and London," are discernible as a Water-mark in every leaf of the book of directions around each pot or box; the same may be plainly seen by holding the leaf to the light. A handsome reward will be given to any one rendering such information as may lead to the detection of any party or parties counterfeiting or vending the same, knowing them to be spurious.

IS pleasantly situated at the head of ST. PAUL STREET, amongst the largest wholesale houses in the city. It has (with business men generally, and especially with the best Merchants of both Provinces) become so great a favorite, that it is now acknowledged to be THE Business Hotel of Montreal. To meet the extensive increase, during the last year in the business of the house, the proprietor has built a large addition. The Dining Room has been extended and made more commodious; there have been completed in the new wing, a great number of well-ventilated sleeping rooms, and the House throughout has been refitted, and now contains many improvements and conveniences hitherto unknown to its guests. The whole of the beds have, at a great expence, been furnished with NEW SPRING MATTRASSES. The Proprietor expects that by continuing his personal management of the concern, THE ALBION to say the least of it, will continue to be, as it now is, the best Dollar and a half Hotel in Canada.

Selected Poetry.

'TIS A LONG LANE THAT HAS NO TURNING.

Hope on brave heart, oppress'd by sorrow,
Though gloomy be that path to-day;
The clouds may disappear to-morrow,
And thou more clear may see thy way,
A ray of bright'ner hours discerning—
'Tis a long lane that has no turning.

Hope on, fond parent, youth is erring,
And thy beloved one gone astray,
Awhile the path of vice preferring,
May yet return some happy day,
Repentant, for thy blessing yearing—
'Tis a long lane that has no turning.

Hope on, poor wife, alone and weary,
Listening for that well-known tread,
Through the night so long and dreary,
Every moment fraught with dread.
While sinks thy taper dimly burning—
'Tis a long lane that has no turning!

Hope on young workers, sisters, brothers,
Labouring for your daily bread;
Whate'er your calling, serving others
With horny hands, or aching head,
Keep ye the lamp of hope a-burning—
'Tis a long lane that has no turning!

ANGEL WHISPERS.

Angel whispers, softly stealing
From some distant, unknown shore,
Life and light and hope revealing,
Bid us murmur never more.
Listen! catch that low-breathed whisper,
Hear ye what those voices speak?
Loved ones call in sweetest music—
Speak not, lest the spell ye break.

Child of earth, oh heart of sorrow,
Cease thy murmurings, dry thy tears—
Hearken, for the coming morrow
Seals the doom of misery's years.
Angel, beckon, wearying never—
Earthward stretch their arms for thee—
Burst their bonds, unclasp each fetter,
Murmur not—thou'll soon be free.

Clarice Dalton.

"But mother do let me go; I've been in mourning two years! It's unreasonable of you to expect me to keep myself shut up any longer!" And the young lady's bright dark eyes kindled with determination, as, planting a little foot firmly on the floor she muttered "I will go!"

"It is true Clarice," said her mother, who was dressed in deep mourning, "that you are old enough to take care of yourself, as you say; but I doubt if it would be prudent in me to trust my child to the care of a gentleman I have seen but once, and of whom I know nothing save what Mrs. Fitzroy says—of whose opinion, by the way, I never thought much."

"Mother, he is the most perfect gentleman; and as to trusting me with him, I'm not a baby, and—"

"Clarice," interrupted the lady, "if I could go with you, or if your aunt was well enough, I should not object; but, my dear child, I love you too well to expose you to any danger—and however fascinating Mr. Elmont may be to you, remember you do not know him. It is my wish, my daughter that you remain at home with your aunt while I am gone to Wilton. See that you do not disregard it." And the lady left the room, saying as she closed the door, "Make haste Clarice, I shall wait for you."

"I don't want to go out with mother this morning," soliloquized Clarice, as soon as she was left alone. "I shouldn't wonder if Mr. Elmont were to call while I was gone. I won't! I'll stay at home!" and she rose as she spoke and pulled the bell sharply.—"Emena," said she, as her maid appeared, "tell mamma that I'm going to practice this morning; I don't want to ride."

So Mrs. Dalton, disappointed at her daughter's disinclination to accompany her, went out alone; thinking as she stepped into her carriage, Clarice is not so amiable as she once was, and I'm afraid she does not love her mother as much.

Mr. Dalton had died two years before leaving his property, which was considerable unreservedly to his widow and child. Clarice was at school at the time, but as she was completing the last term, her mother deemed it advisable that she should not return until its expiration.

Clarice was naturally an open-hearted, affectionate girl, but self-willed and impetuous. Many a hasty word had been sorrowed over with bitter tears, as having caused pain to those she loved best. On this morning she was in anything but an amiable mood. Her mother's refusal had excited all the rebellion which lay dormant in her nature. Ah! could she have seen the bitter fruits it would bear! She sat down at the piano, but her thoughts wandered from the music, and her fingers from the keys, as she rose and sauntered through the parlors, and out into the conservatory where in fragrant profusion bloomed the choicest exotics. She stopped before the beautiful camelia, the unfolding of whose petals she had watched every day with interest. It was to gleam in its purity among the raven tresses on the night of the forbidden ball. Her mind wavered as she stood there, her eyes fixed on the snowy blossom whose very purity awakened the half formed resolution, "I—think—I'll at——" But no, she resolutely walked away and seating herself by one of the windows of the front parlor was evidently watching for some one.

At last she remembered her aunt, who lonely and ill, lay on her sick bed up stairs. How could I be so forgetful, she thought, as she tripped lightly up the broad stairs. Tapping gently at the door she said, "Aunt Nell may I come in?"

"Yes, love," said a voice from within. "O, I'm so glad you've come, Clarie dear," she continued, as the young girl leaned over her for a kiss, "I'm very dull here by myself, I think I shall get up and come down stairs."

The speaker was a beautiful but exceedingly delicate lady, apparently not more than twenty-five. She was Mrs. Dalton's youngest sister, and like her a widow. It was feared that her health, always delicate had now become hopelessly so. She had no children, and her love for Clarice possessed that of her elder sister, while the young girl felt for her all the warm love of her affectionate disposition.

"I ought to have come before, Nelly dear, said Clarice, caressingly stroking her aunts soft brown hair; "but I've been cross all the morning, and you know——"

"What put your ladyship out of temper," laughed aunt Nell, amused with the comical look which accompanied the confession.

"Oh, it's not much, after all," replied Clarice, fidgeting with her aunt's watch which lay by; only mother doesn't want me to go the ball."

"Who was to chaperon you, Clarice?"

There was a deep blush on her cheek as she answered, "Mr. Elmont, Auntie."

"What? the gentleman Louise speaks so much about? queried the lady.

"Yes, she would give anything to know him, but he took no notice of her after they were introduced."

"But, Clarice your mother was speaking to me about it just before she went away, and she said that she particularly wished for you to remain at home during her absence."

"I dare say," said Clarice, impatiently: "stay at home a whole week, and I've ever so many invitations."

"You must decline them all, my dear."

"I will not. Mother's very foolish to wish it. She treats me more like a child than—"

"A grown up young lady of seventeen," said her aunt. "But, Clarice, couldn't we manage to have pleasant evenings together just for one week? Herbert Taughton will come as usual, and you can get your cousin Cora to stay with you, and I'm sure in the day time you'll have no lack of visitors."

"Everybody I don't want to see I know will come:" said Clarice with a pout.

"Don't think too much of Mr. Elmont, Clarice. He is not the man for you, depend upon it."

"Don't Auntie!" and she left the room abruptly.

The bell rang as she descended the stairs and the rest of the morning was spent in a shopping excursion with Mr. Elmont.

Thursday night came, and Clarice stood waiting in her room. She was tastefully attired in a simple white robe of delicate lace. The camelia was the sole ornament of her long raven curls. Emena held a costly wreath in her hand.

"Wear this, Miss, do."

"No; I'll go just as I am," decided Clarice, clasping a massive gold bracelet on her arm. Then going to her jewel case she took a splendidly wrought medallion bracelet composed of exquisite miniatures of her parents and three nestly surrounded with pearls.

But she could not wear that. Her mother's face seemed to look reproachfully from the tiny miniature, and she replaced it in the casket.

"The carriage is waiting, Miss."

Without one word of farewell to her aunt Clarice descended the stairs. Her heart beat with a remorseful pang as Mr. Elmont handed her into the carriage, bending on her as he did so a glance of admiration.

The ball was brilliant, and Clarice was the belle of the evening.

Before she reached home she had promised to elope with Elmont if her mother's consent could not be obtained. As she walked wearily up the stairs she was met by the maid.

"How has aunt been?" she inquired.

"She would not go to bed, Miss," was the answer. "She waited in the drawing-room for you."

Sad and more than half ashamed, Clarice opened the door. Her aunt was lying on the sofa. The brown curls hid her face from her niece's anxious gaze. There was an ominous stillness in the room. It oppressed the young girl's heart with an icy feeling of dread—a fear of something, she hardly knew what. Gently she approached the chandelier and lowered the lights, for she could not bear the glare.

The time piece struck three. Noiselessly she stole to her aunt's side, and with trembling fingers raised the drooping tresses.—Her pale cheek sent a cold thrill through her frame. She bent down. Her eyes were closed; she looked as if she were sleeping, but there was no spirit in her fragile form.

With frantic eagerness she kissed the still lips.

"Oh, Auntie, I've killed you dead!" she repeated, while strong shudders shook her from head to foot. "Emma, come, come quick, Auntie ——" was all that she could say, and she sank fainting to the floor.

A brain fever followed the dreadful shock of that night. Mrs. Dalton returned to find her daughter raving in delirium, and her sister cold in death.

Many weeks passed before Clarice was able to speak with her sorrowing mother on the sad subject. And then the confession of her fatal disobedience threw her again into her former dangerous state.

"And yet," said she, shudderingly, "if Auntie had lived I should have ——"

"Broken your mother's heart," said Mrs. Dalton, while she breathed a prayer inwardly that this severe trial might be of lasting benefit to her child. And in after years when Elmont proved a spendthrift and unprincipled libertine, she had reason to be thankful that such a fate was not hers. And she became the happy wife of Herbert Taughton.

But she never forgot that night. I heard her tell the story to her eldest daughter, who is her mother's counterpart.

CUTTING WOOD FOR A WAGER.

Quite a crowd of persons collected in the Court House Square, on Saturday afternoon, in spite of the snow storm, to witness the novel feat of a coloured man cutting firewood for a wager. He had been brought expressly from Brantford, by one Mr. Wilkins, living there, who had made a wager of $25 that he would cut a cord of wood in 45 minutes, each stick cut once. The wood was brought to the spot, and the wood cutter set to work in good earnest, surrounded by the persons attracted to the scene. He failed to win the wager, not accomplished his task in 50½ minutes. He is a strong, muscular man, and looks as if he could bear any amount of fatigue; but he cannot cut a cord of wood—knotty kinds of timber.—Spectator.

MISS BREEMER ON THE SULTAN.

Miss Fredrika Breemer, in a recent magazine article, thus describes the Turkish Sultan:—

"A little man in a dark coat, a dark red cap with a long black tassel on his head, and a pale, unpleasing countenance, comes down the steps, with as little dignity as a shopman. Can that really be the Sultan? Yes, it must be the Sultan, because the elderly military personages by his side reply with an expression of deep reverence to some remarks of the little man, and, the stout lady with the children steps hastily forward into his path, as if she would stop his further advance. He starts, makes a half step backward, and contracts his eyebrows most threateningly. Yet he listens to what she has to say, but listens with a gloomy expression, and then casts an inquiring glance on his brother-in-law, the High Admiral. He utters a few words of explanation, shrugging his shoulders, and then another word or two, which seem to say.—"What do I know about your husband?"—motions the stout lady out of the way, and walks on to the shore, talking gaily with the gentlemen who attend him. He steps into the caique, from which the canopy has been removed; puts on his glasses, distorts his face in looking up at the sun, and so doing exhibits his tobacco-stained teeth; while his plain, uninteresting countenance assumes a most disagreeable expression. This, then is the man who is called "God's shadow on earth," and who rules with absolute sway over the lives and happiness of £35,000,000 of human beings. I have seen many crowned heads, but none who seem to me so deroid of anything remarkable as this "Shadow of God on earth." Nevertheless the throne must produce an effect either for good or for evil. Travellers who see Abdul Medjid only at public audiences, usually observe merely the lifeless, automatic character of his exterior. I now saw him under other circumstances. He was lively, and his countenance, although pale, indicated more youthful strength and health than I had been led to expect. "That is," I was told "because within the last few years he has drunk something stronger than champagne, and this has given him strength. Besides, he generally looks very gloomy." For the rest, Abdul Medjid has the Turkish family features, the oval countenance, with somewhat prominent cheek bones, the nose broad at the nostrils and arched, the dark-brown, well cut, but not large, eyes, and the finely pencilled eyebrows. They struck me as finest when contracted with their threatening expression, and the countenance then appeared most significant. If they could contract with a grave earnestness, Abdul Medjid would be a man of high character. Naturally mild of disposition, a good son, good brother, unwilling although a despot, to sign a death warrant, Abdul Medjid is not wanting in the softer feelings. That which he wants is real earnestness, real strength. So, at least, it seems to me. He does not seriously throw himself into anything, but lets all go as it may and will.—"Allah Kerim!"

SAM SLICK ON SIR EDMUND HEAD.

Mr. Haliburton is a contributor to the Dublin University Magazine, and in the February number he has a sketch which cannot but be interesting to our readers:—

"PEABODY" ON STATE CRAFT.—Why it don't stand to reason, nor convene to the nature of things—Latin and Greek may do for governing Oxford or Cambridge, but Gladstone found Homer did'nt help him at Corfu, where he made an awful mess of matters, and Palmerston will have to talk something better than he learned in Ovid, or Virgil to the Pope. The Governor General of Canada has written a book since he went there, and what do you think it is about? The Quebec and Halifax Railway? No, that's tardy. The monopoly of the Norwest Company, that obstructs the settlement of a country as big as all France? No, that would bring down the great Bear hunter, and the Lord knows who upon him. The construction of a practicable route from Canada to Vancouver's Island, by which the China trade might be made to pass through the British territory? No, for that would involve expense and trouble, and he might get a hint he had better mind his own business. An historical, geographical, and statistical account of British North America? No, that cenotry is growing so fast, it would require a new addition every year. Do you give it up? Well, it is a treatise on the words "could, would and should."—Now he COULD write sometain' more to the purpose, if he WOULD, and he SHOULD do it, too, if he held office under me, that's a fact. Yes, it takes a horseman to select cattle for the head, or the pole, and a consideration of the right sort to drive them too, and and it takes a man who knows all about colonies, and the people that dwell there, to select Governors of the right sort, and to manage them, when he gets the collar on 'em. State craft ain't larned by instinct, for even dogs, who hent all created critter for that, have to be trained. It ain't book larnin' that is wanted in Downing-street; if it was, despatches might be wrote like the Pope's allocutions in Latin, but it's a knowledge of men and things that is required.—It's not dead languages, but living ones that's wanted. Ask the Head Secretary what the principal export of Canada is, and it's as like as not he will refer you to the Board of Trade, as it is more in their line than his; and if you go there, and put the same question, it's an even chance if they don't tell you they are so busy in bothering shipowners with surveys, and hoisting coasts at hawley, to make sailors think of summer, for accidents, and other fun, that they haven't time to be examining into you. Well, don't be discouraged, go back to the Colonial office, and try it again. Ship you to head clerk, "What's the principal Canadian export?" "I don't know any of that name," he'll say: "there was a chap here yesterday, but I should say Quebec." "No," says you, "not that, but what's the chief commodity or production they send to Great Britain?" "Oh, now I understand," he'll say, "it's timber, you ought to know that, for we had trouble enough about lumber duties lately." "Well, what kind of timber?" says you, "square or manufactured, hard or soft wood, which is the most valuable, white or black birch, hemlock or larch, cedar or spruce? which wood makes the best trunnils, and which the best knees for a ship?" Well, I'll take you a bet of a hundred dollars he can't tell you. "Then says you, "which is the best flour Canadian or American? which keeps sweet the longest? and what is the cause of the difference? Have they any iron ore there? if so, where is it, and how is it smelted? with pit or charred coal? and which makes the best article? Well, the gosney will stare like a scaffawag that has seen the elephant, see if he don't! Now, go into any shop you like in London, from Storr and Mortimer's down to the penny bazaar, and see if the counter-skippers in 'em don't know the name, quality, and price of everything they have. Let me just ask you, then, is it right that a national office like that should be worse served and attended to than them, and be no better than a hurrah's nest.

LIVING AND MEANS.

The world is full of people who don't imagine why they don't prosper like their neighbours, when the real obstacle is not in banks nor tariffs, in bad public policy nor hard times, but in their own extravagance and heedless ostentation. The young mechanic or clerk marries, hires a house, which he proceeds to furnish twice as expensively as he can afford, and then his wife, instead of taking hold to help him to earn a living, by doing her own work, must have a hired servant to help her to spend her limited earnings. Ten years afterwards, you will find him struggling on under a double load of debts and children, wondering why the luck was always against him, while his friends regret his unhappy destitution of financial ability. Had they from the first been frank and honest, he need not have been so unlucky.

Through every grade of society, this vice of inordinate expenditure insinuates itself.—The single man, "hired out" in the country at ten to fifteen dollars per month, who contrives to dissolve his two years' earnings in frolic and fine clothes; the clerk who has three to five hundred dollars, and melts down twenty to fifty of it into liquor and cigars, are paralleled by the young merchant who fills his spacious house with costly furniture, gives dinners, and drives a fast horse on the strength of the profits he expects to realize when his goods are sold and his notes all paid. Let a man have a genius for spending, and whether his income is a dollar a day or a dollar a minute, it is equally certain to prove inadequate. If dining, wining, and party-giving, won't help him through with it, building, gaming, and speculating will be sure to. The bottomless pocket will never fill, no matter how bounteous the streams pouring into it. The man who (being single) does not save money on six dollars per week, will not be apt to on sixty; and he who does not lay up something in his first year of independent exertion, will be pretty likely to wear a poor man's hair into his grave.

HINTS FOR THOSE WHO NEED THEM.

Usually, where there is poverty, there is a slovenly, heedless woman. A man may work ever so hard, and get good wages, and yet have a barren, thriftless home, himself and children go ragged and comfortless, unless his wife understands true economy and takes care of what comes in her way.

It is surprising how few women consider it necessary to use prudence in the management of their wardrobes and household affairs. A woman who considers it beneath her time and attention to use half-worn garments to supply her family with bed-clothes or carpets, and cannot take the trouble to keep a rag-bag or basket, deserves to be poor always. How much better old dress skirts look, neatly tied into bed-comforters, than stringing all about the house, and tucked into odd corners and broken panes. No matter if poverty does not compel you to save paper rags, keep a bag nevertheless, and when full give it to your poor neighbor; it will cost you not a moment of time to take care of "lots" of things that, if you do not want them, will be useful to some one. I like to help a tidy, industrious poor family, but when I go into a house and see disorder, waste, filth, and enough laying about, if properly taken care of, to make a comfortable home, I feel it is of no use to give such people things to abuse and destroy. They will always be poor, and no person could possibly assist them.

Pomposity and false pride, or shiftlessness and pride, and poverty, usually go hand in hand. What a pity that men and women, who have no love of labor, no fancy for housework, no love of children, should marry and attempt to raise a family, to be a nuisance to themselves and the community.

Some err through ignorance, but many more through idleness, and unwillingness to study and practice the constantly recurring details by which people in the country usually secure a comfortable independence.—They go to their graves, mourning over their poverty, and carrying these "mere fortunate," as they call it, and wondering at the "mysterious ways of Providence," while all the time, the fault lies at their own doors.

A scuffle between some Irish laborers took place on a bridge, and a battle royal ensuing, one of the Hibernians was very unceremoniously tumbled over the bridge. While his over-thumbing in the water, he kindly exclaimed to his opponents—"Only ye spalpeen, come and hit me now if you dare!"

Uncle said a hand to a lad who had just entered his house, "your father's drowned." "Darn it, replied the young hopeful, "he's got my knife in his pocket.

Carrying home coals from the grocery in a wheelbarrow may be genteel, but it's bad for the liver.

AN ISLE OF SYKE VETERAN.

But my chief delight here is my friend and neighbor, Mr. Meelan. He was a soldier in his youth; is now very old—ninety and odd I should say. He would strike one with a sense of strangeness in a city, and among men of the present generation. Here, however, he creates no surprise; he is a natural product of the region, like the red heather, or the bed of the dried torrent.—He is a master of legendary lore. He knows the history of every considerable family in the island; he circulates like sap through every genealogical tree; he is an enthusiast in Gaelic poetry, and is fond of reciting compositions of native bards, his eyes lighted up, and his tongue moving glibly over the rugged clots of consonants. He has a servant cunning upon the pipes, and dwelling there for a week. I heard Ronald often wandering near the house, refreshing himself with their music; now a plaintive love-song, now a coronach for chieftain borne to his grave, now a battle march, the notes of which, melancholy and monotonous at first, would all at once soar into a higher strain, and then hurry and madden as beating time to the footsteps of the clan going clan. I am the feel of ascention; and the tree under which the hag has rested, the stone as which a banner was planted on the morning of some victorious or disastrous day, the house in which some great man first saw the light, are to me the sacredest thing. This light gray, keen-eyed man—the scabbard sorely frayed now, the blade sharp and bright as ever—gives me thrill like an old coin with its half-obliterated effigy, a Druid stone on a moor, a stain of blood on the floor of a palace. He stands before me a living figure, and history groups itself behind by way of a background. He sits at the same board with me, and yet he lifted Moore at Corunna, and saw the gallant dying eyes flash up with their last pleasure when the Highlanders charged past.—He lay down to sleep in the light of Wellington's watch-fires in the gorges of the piny Pyrenees; around him roared the death thunders of Waterloo. There is a certain awfulness about very old men; they are amongst us, but not of us. They drop out of the living soil and herbage of to-day, like rocky strata bearing marks of the glacier or the wave. Their roots strike deeper than ours, and they draw sustenance from an earlier layer of soil. They are lonely amongst the young, they cannot form new friendships, and are unwilling to be gone. They feel the "sublime attractions of the grave;" for the soil of churchyards once flashed hind eyes on them, heard with them the chimes at midnight, sang and shouted the brimming goblet with them; and the present Tom and Harry are as nothing to the Tom and Harry that swaggered about and taunted the reigning belles seventy years ago. We are accustomed to lament the shortness of life; but it is wonderful how long it is notwithstanding. Often a single life, like a summer twilight, connects two historic days. Count back four lives, and King Charles is kneeling on the scaffold at Whitehall. To hear Maclan speak, one could not help thinking in the way. In a short run across the mainland with him this summer, we reached Culloden Moor. The old gentleman, with a mournful air—for he is a great Jacobite, and wear's the prince's hair in a ring—pointed out the burial-grounds of the clans. Struck with his manner, I inquired how he came to know the real resting-places. As if hurt, he drew himself up, laid his hand on my shoulder, saying, "Those who put them in told me." Heavens, how a century and odd years collapsed, and the bloody field,—the battle smoke not yet cleared away, and where Cumberland's artillery told among the clansmen sleeping in thicket, like swathes,—unrolled itself from the horizon down to my very feet! For a whole evening he will sit and speak of his London life; and I cannot help contrasting the young officer, who trod Bond Street with powder in his hair, at the end of last century, with the old man living in the shadow of Blavin now."—Alexander Smith in Macmillan's Magazine.

THE GAME OF CURLING.

Curling is a game so intensely childish that it cannot be overpraised as an adult pastime. Children at play love those games the best where they have to contain the character of men, and we who are men love that game the most that it is the most thoroughly childish in its glee.

and capricious monarch already referred to in no respector of persons, but is frowningly polite to all who accept his hospitality.—The chartist weaver, whose politics are of course of the liveliest description, is rather pleased to join in a mixed game of this sort and he cries, "Soop, my lord, soop," with quite a pleasurable sensation. His lordship too, obeys the exhortation quite irrespective of him who addresses him, and flatterers give him a light for his pipe, unconscious of having done anything unusual. Perhaps it is in men of sixty or thereby that we find the keenest relish for the game of curling. Many a man at this time of life begins to consider each winter's ice as the last he may enjoy, and as he steps once again upon the last good ice of the season, gratitude mingles with the old man's glee as he revels in the innocent mirth of a second boyhood. Shall we overlook the pride each player takes in his toys in their weight, shape, bevil, and material. His position in society and the style he affects in "the world" are easily expressed in his handles, upon which considerable taste and expense can be lavished. Even the man whose vanity prompts him affect rudeness or unassuming boorishness can have these pretensions strictly reflected in the rough iron and unpolished slab. We see the favorite Ailsa blocks about which so many fables are vended over the beef and greens. It appears they have to be smuggled away from the rock by daring deputations from the various clubs who adopt that kind of stone. Their mythical properties, chuckled over by their possessors, are a faculty for becoming dull upon keen ice and keen upon dull. We see too, the Crawfordjohn and some Aberdeenshire granites, apple of their respective proprietor's eye. What so pleasant after dinner (what so pleasant by the way as curlers' fare?) as to hear friendly discussion regarding the proper weight of a stone, the best device for a footboard—and every club has its pet contrivance, we ourselves even preferring wood—the real and the spurious form of broom or "kowe," the best form of refreshment during a game, [one of Glenlivat?] and the best way of getting that confounded artificial pond to hold water.—Regarding the last it is needless to state that nineteen artificial ponds out of twenty are only nineteen expensive failures, the twentieth pond being both cheap and successful. It appears that the secret of constructing these ponds is only known to about half-a-dozen men in Scotland, among whom our Contemplative Correspondent pretends that he is one, but we have reasons of our own for doubting this. Curling is called the "roaring" game by the various country parties who send in news, although we never hear this term applied to it in conversation. But a review of the different risks in any county shows that the qualities is quite properly applied. We have even taken the trouble of constructing a table, which may be seen at the office of this 'Journal,' in which the various ranks and conditions of men are set down in order according to the noise they make upon the ice. Thus, taking 100 the noise that might be made by an escaped maniac, we have the following result:—Millers, 89.05; shoemakers, 78; masons, 779; shopkeepers 55; surgeons, 53; farmers, 48; bakers 35; legal practitioners, 31; clergymen, 33; country gentlemen: baronets, 32.75; noblemen, 21; Editors of newspapers, 21; schoolmasters, 19; dissenting ministers, 8; tract distributors, no returns.

LORD MELVILLE ON VOLUNTEERS.

The present position of Lord Melville, our Commander-in-Chief for Scotland—the position offensively describable as being down on his narrow-bones—is not the only reason why people should abstain from hitting him hard. Of course, it cannot be concealed that Lord Melville's offence was very rank, smelling that it not only smelt of the Horse Guards, but has been apologised for by the gallant offender, who is peculiarly indisposed to retreat in such matters. Mr. Sidney Herbert, on Thursday evening, regretted that Lord Elcho should have referred to the subject in Parliament at all; but how could it be avoided, when so glaring a contradiction had arisen? The Queen met her Parliament with the statement that she had received the offers of service made by the volunteers, and not only thus stamped the movement with the royal approval, but speaking for the Government, recognized in the volunteer body "an important element in our system of national defence." While the Sovereign was thus encouraging and instigating the movement, her Commander of the Forces in Scotland was doing his best to repress it and throw cold water upon it. That of itself called for some explanation, but there was more of the same sort of discrepancy behind. The Duke of Cambridge had praised the volunteer force and objects, and had readily accepted the command of the City of London Regiment.—Yet Lord Melville, the Commander of the Forces for Scotland, declared that the volunteers "were perfectly useless, and no general officer would command them." Here was one general officer, the chief of the whole British army, who had readily come forward to command them—could it be that General Lord Melville was deputed to speak for all the rest? Decidedly the matter wanted clearing up, and there was no better way of doing that than to bring it to the notice of the Minister of War, as Lord Elcho did. The result has been highly satisfactory. The country may deplore that the Commander-in-Chief at the Horse Guards considered Lord Melville's offence so flagrant that he immediately wrote for and obtained an apology. But as Lord Melville's, senseless as they were, had travelled throughout the country, and had done whatever harm they could do, it was necessary that their antidote should receive equal publicity, and that his Lordship should be made to eat his humble pie in the face of the whole nation. That has accordingly been done, with, we should think, the best effect. Lord Melville's letter afforded sufficient satisfaction to the Duke of Cambridge for the personal insult which his previous words conveyed, but, so long as its contents remained private, it did not atone for the outrage upon the general body of volunteers, nor counteract the injury it must have to what the nation—not less than the Queen and Government—has recognized as a most important element in the future defence and safety of the country.—Scotsman.

A WHITE GIRL BOUGHT BY WARD BEECHER'S CHURCH.

A white girl, nine years of age, one-sixteenth African blood, was exhibited in Rev. Henry Ward Beecher's Church, Brooklyn, after service on Sunday, and the $800 necessary for her purchase pledged on the spot, and a lady in the audience making herself responsible for any deficiency in the amount collected. The story of this girl is a bit vivid commentary on the slave system of this country. She is one of six children born at Washington, the national capital, whose father is a white physician of the highest respectability, and the mother a light mulatto slave. Five of the children and the mother had been sold to go South, the sixth can last been engaged for $800 by a slave trader, when a clergyman at Alexandria learned the facts and got possession to bring her North, to see if money could be raised to free her. Such an appeal could not be resisted by Mr Beecher's church, and the little white girl will not be sold South to become "a breeder" for some respectable white man.

WRECK OF THE 'HUNGARIAN.'

It is but three short months since one of the finest Atlantic steamships became a wreck, and the shock caused by that melancholy event has scarcely subsided when the news of another similar but more appalling catastrophe reaches us. As in the case of the Indian the news from the scene of the wreck is extremely meagre and somewhat conflicting, but all accounts seem to agree that with the ill-fated Hungarian has perished the whole of her passengers and crew, numbering at least 700 souls.—From the various despatches from Halifax, also from Barrington the nearest telegraph station to the wreck, we learn that on Monday morning the 23rd, at 3 o'clock, a steamer's light was seen from the main-land, and at daylight a large steamer was seen ashore with only one mast standing. A gale was blowing at the time and no assistance could be sent from the shore. Under these circumstances there is no room for hope that the crew and passengers could have escaped by means of the boats; one of the boats belonging to the ship has been washed ashore, bottom up, with the oars lashed to thwarts showing that it had probably been swept overboard, or at least had never been used. Only two bodies have been washed ashore, but this may be accounted for by the fact that the tide is rapid in that locality, and the bodies may have been carried awry by the ebb beyond the possibility of their ever being driven upon the beach. The cause of the sad calamity is not now known, and may ever be a subject for conjecture. Captain Jones, the commander of the vessel, was known as a competent and careful navigator, and his amiable disposition won him the universal confidence and respect of the travelling public; therefore we cannot believe that the calamity could have been the result of negligence on his part. The loss of two vessels of the Canadian Line within so short a period cannot but be lamented by everyone.

At first it was feared that John McKellar, M.P.P. for Kent, Rev. Mr. King, and Hon. W. H. Merritt, were among the passengers, but we are happy to state there is little grounds for longer supposing this to be the case. Of Messrs Talbot, representative for East Middlesex; Mr. Dawson, President of the North West Transportation Company; Rev. Dr. O'Meara, the pioneer among our Indian Missionaries; Mr Blackwell, Manager of the Grand Trunk; Mr. F Shanly, and a number of other gentlemen connected with commercial houses in Montreal, Toronto, and Hamilton, there is nothing positive known. They were expected by the Hungarian, but may have been delayed beyond their appointed time. The Anglo-Saxon, now due, will bring the list of passengers. The following account of the vessel will be read with interest:—

"The Hungarian was one of seven powerful screw-steamers owned by the Montreal Steamship Company, which were employed in running between Liverpool and Quebec and Montreal in summer, and to Portland in winter, touching at Cork. The present was the third trip which she had made, all her voyages having been performed in good time, and under favorable circumstances. She is of iron, 2,500 tons burden, was built on the Clyde in 1857, and was classed A 1 at Lloyds, where her hull is insured; her cargo being probably insured in part in the United States. She was valued at about £40,000. The Hungarian was a beautiful specimen of naval architecture, her bows rounded to that curve which modern shipbuilders have adopted as the shape which offers least resistance to the water. The rest of the hull was also in graceful proportions.

"The vessel was 320 feet in length, her breadth of beam 36 feet, and depth of hold 27 feet. She was propelled by double engines of 350 horse power. The engines were constructed by Tulloch & Denny, Dumbarton, and the vessel built by Mr. William Denny & Brothers, of the same place.

Her crew, all told, amounted to 110, which includes about 40 waiters. As this number was somewhat reduced at the present season, it is possible the crew did not exceed 100 persons. She had accommodations for 150 cabin and 300 steerage passengers."

DR. EYERSON AND THE MINISTRY.

It has been observed of Charles II. of England, that the essential qualifications he deemed necessary for a thorough politician, was, that he should talk like an honest man and act like a rogue. Had our Rev. Superintendent of Education, Dr. Ryerson, lived during the reign of the "Merry Monarch" he might probably have been as great a favorite with him as he is at present with the party who rule the destines of Canada.

On Wednesday, the 23rd ultimo, our new and elegant Union School was formally opened for tuition by the Rev. Superintendent of education. On this occasion the Rev. gentleman did not as usual at such meetings, appear in his now celebrated suit of home-spun garments, from the fact as we learn that they have become so much soiled and thread bare of late, that the public are now beginning to see through them, we therefore had to forego the pleasure of hearing the Dr. expatiate on the great advantage of protection to native industry. Still the Rev. gentleman's penchant for assisting the "powers that be" was not overlooked. Canada, at present, according to the Dr's. ideas was in a most flourishing condition, both at home and abroad. For example the Postmaster-General's arrangement for carrying weekly across the Atlantic about a hatfull of Continental letters was extoled as a wonderful feat of Canadian diplomacy.—The finance Minister also came in for his share of praise, owing to his late operations in England, which according to the Rev. Superintendent's notions will in future relieve us, as a people, from all care as to money matters; such is the immaculate financial abilities of Mr. Galt.

During these political statements of the Dr. we grieve to say the muscles of the larger portion of the audience were brought into play and a grin was on almost every countenance, still out of respect to our local clergymen who were present, a roar and out laugh was not consumated; still we think the Dr. could not fail to see which way the "wind blew" in this Town in regard to our opinion relative to the Canadian Ministry, which it is the Rev. gentleman's pleasure to bemoan with so much praise.

In conclusion we would beg to suggest to the Rev. Superintendent of education the propriety of letting politics alone in his professional tours through this province, for he may rest assured that all the "casual advantages" the ministry can derive from that source is more than counterbalanced by the disgust it occasions to more than nine tenths of the people.

DR. RYERSON'S MEETING.

Mr. Editor,—In accordance to public notice in that behalf, the Rev. Dr. Ryerson Chief Superintendent of Education for Canada West honored our good Town with his presence on the 22nd inst. A speckling of persons from country and town assembled at 2 p. m., in the new School House. The proceedings opened at about half past 2, by calling Wm. Cottingham Esq., as Chairman, and Thos. White, Jun., Esq., as Secretary. The Chairman in one of his laconic speeches introduced the learned Superintendent, who came forward, and gave us a long talk upon our Common School system, showing its excellence compared with any other, and how it was progressing. Still it wanted a little tinkering he thought, in the shape of an additional tax so as to make the schools free, that parents who now pay one shilling and three pence per month, extra, for educating each child, shall be allowed to send his children free.—This is all very well, but in connection with this freedom, the Dr. considered as did two of our judges before him, and I regret to add that so many there present thought a law should be passed compelling the attendance of all children at school. The announcement called forth the applause of the meeting.

After sundry observations and comparisons between Canada and the State of New York, the worthy Dr. called the attention of the meeting to the inefficiency of the Grammar Schools in the country, thought they were not sufficiently endowed, recommended that they should be made free as well as the Common Schools. To accomplish which, he proposed that the County Councils should lay on a tax on all the property of the County so as to raise an equivilant to the Government grant, and for which the schools should be free for all the youth from the country. After a talk of some two hours length, the Dr. sat down saying he would be happy to hear the views of gentlemen present in regard to the suggestions thrown out, or answer questions which may be submitted.

After answering a few on local matters, a person from Otonabee stood up and told the meeting that he had never been to school, had not received an education, felt much the need of it, and laid it down as a principle that no parent had a right to deny education to his child. The law he maintained should compel a parent to educate his child. The Dr. maintained so to. The steam now got up, and one after another rose and lauded our school system, and especially these new additions of taxes, and penalties, when Rev. Mr. Douglas stated, that being tolerably well acquainted with the different school systems especially in Britian and the Continent of Europe, he questioned the wisdom of adapting the principle of free schools, that one objection to them had been urged, they were looked upon as pauper schools and it might be a question whether education would be as much prized, when free as when it was paid for.

When Mr. D. sat down the Dr. who had the appearance of being displeased, rose and replied rather sharp and took occasion by a reference to the pauper schools to remind the gentleman who had sat down, that we had no such in Canada. The manner in which it was done appeared to me very unguiteously, apart from the right of even the Chief Superintendent, to put down a person for entertaining and expressing an opinion of his own, if that opinion is in opposition. The fact is there is no much of freedom now a days, that when a big dog like our Chief comes along, every cur must bow down before him or pay the penalty. Well done the Dr. knew this, and how well he used his influence on Wednesday last, there present can judge. He appealed to the audience for a cheer, and they gave it at Mr. Douglas's expense.

Then came forward the door-keeper, and expressed his regret that "our worthy superintendent" should speak so, should oppose the Chief Superintendent, and all of us, &c. Where was the Magna Charta! I maintain that Mr. Douglas had as good a right to express an opinion on schools as any one in the meeting, be it right or wrong and it would have been more to the Chief Superintendent's credit to have answered Mr. Douglas as one gentleman ought to answer another, than to cause the people to laugh at him. It may be deemed a happy hit, but it is a mean action, which all right thinking men will despise. If Dr. Ryerson did not know, our people knew that Mr. Douglas had ever shown himself the friend of education, both in town and country, and the mark of disrespect shown him on Wednesday, was as discreditable to all concerned, as it was uncalled for.

The resolution proposing to make the schools free was put and carried, without opposition.

The next resolution declared that power should be given to Municipal bodies to enforce the attendance of all children at school An amendment was put in, to the effect that such a proposition was an infringement on parental rights, which the state has no right to invade. The amendment was supported by very few, not probably a dozen. As a matter of course the resolution was carried.

Parties who so far forget what is right to an individual, will be ready to inflict a wrong on the community. As there is something strange about this resolution, I shall refer to it. It was introduced by the Secretary, and it seemed to me that he was at a loss to get a seconder. I saw the uneducated man referred to, with a paper, looking at it, as if he were to move or second it, but it was no go. The resolution was seconded by Mr. Wm. Henry Moore, against his will, he has said since he does not approve of its sentiment, that Mr. White put his name down, and he not thinking it amounts to much, let it pass. Nor do I think it amounts to much. No fear of Councils putting in force any such arbitrary measures However, as straws show how the wind blows, we may learn that tyranny will keep showing its hideous head, where power is, notwithstanding the bulwarks thrown around it. The discussion upon both amendment and resolution had to be cut short as night was fast coming on.

Mr. Gruver introduced the next resolution, "That the Grammar Schools of the County should be free, as well as the Common Schools, and that the Counties Council should lay on a tax for this purpose." The resolution was carried, nem con.

It is somewhat strange, Mr. Editor, that our worthy Chief Superintendent should consider it an imperative duty when any change is proposed in Toronto University, to commence his peregrinations over the country, yet such is the fact.

In 1847, he went round, alluding them to the "magnificent endowment" of Kings College, the value of some of its lands, &c. Shortly after the election took place, the Conference then wanted the endowment divided amongst the denominations. The allusion to the College by our worthy Chief was then intelligible. At this tramp, however, we heard nothing of the College.—It is now known that Conference has come out with a memorial to the Legislature, praying for an Act to scatter University endowments among the various Colleges in the country. It would not answer now to moot the matter. But how about the Grammar Schools, being assisted by the counties!

It is known that the fund from which the Grammar Schools are endowed, as well as Toronto University and its adjuncts, was originally the same. That in 1828 a division was made, so much land being patented to the Grammar Schools, College and Royal Grammar School respectively.—That the Act of 1853 provides that any surplus income of any year shall form a fund to be appropriated by the Legislature for academical education in U. C. That at the close of 1857 the surplus income was said to be nearly £7,000. As the Grammar Schools are now under the superintendence of Dr. Ryerson, why did he not apply for this fund to assist the Grammar Schools that need assistance? Is it because he keeps a wistful longing eye to that "magnificent endowment," and looking forward with ecstacy to the time when his beloved College shall share in the spoils, the dear bought spoils of an indefatigable warfare. I say it is notorious that our Chief Superintendent has publicly advocated the spoilation of our University. He has labored hard and long to get it under his thumb, and having failed he comes boldly out and advocates its destruction.

He now unites with the Conference to pass the Act, to endow the denominational Colleges with University funds. The Grammar Schools he wants the different Counties to assist, so that no more will be required from the "glorious endowment." I have no doubt his chief object in his present tour, is to effect this arrangement. It is all nonsense about his advocating the free or protective policy of the Government, his object is to serve the Conference, and its College. His "consultation" with the leading men in each place on school matters, except so far as the free Grammar Schools are concerned is all moonshine He showed very little desire here to consult. His object was to carry the people with him in his pet schemes. One fact deserves notice in passing, that since the Grammar Schools have been under the superintendence of Dr. Ryerson, they have deteriorated. Ten years ago at our District Grammar Schools an education could be obtained, better than at present. In many places they now are no better than good Common Schools.—We feel that we have sustained an injury by the transfer.

All that remains for the Dr. is to get the control of the University. He has tried this, and fearing failure in realising his wishe comes forward as a member of the conference and publicly advocates the policy of that body in contending for University funds for Victoria Colleges. I submit whether a person occupying the public position he does in educational matters has a right, or rather acts prudently in publicly, advocating the destruction of a public institution at once the glory and pride of our common country. His conduct herein, is but another proof to the many already existing, that he stops at nothing to advance his personal or denominational ends.

Apologizing for the length of this communication,

I am
Mr. Editor,
yours truly,
J. E.

TOWN COUNCIL.

MONDAY, Feb. 27th, 1860.

Council met. His Worship the Mayor in the Chair. The whole Council present.

The minutes of former meeting were read and confirmed.

A petition from Mrs. Warren asking the Council to allow her one dollar a month as rent for a room, was referred to Committee on Charities.

A communication from Mr Elias Burnham was read stating that unless the Council retire the note now lying protested in the Commercial Bank made by him on behalf of the Town, he would take steps to protect himself, was referred to Finance Committee.

A communication from Mr. Geo. Dunsford, applying for the office of Clerk and Treasurer was ordered to be laid on the table.

A Report from the License Inspector shewing the number of Licenses issued and the amounts received during the year, was received and adopted.

The Mayor informed the Council that there had been no quorum on the evening to which the Council was last adjourned, and consequently there had been no report from the Committee to which was referred the suit of Mr. Bradfield, that the last day for appearance was last Wednesday, and upon consulting with Mr. Dennistoun he had instructed him to enter appearance.

The Mayor stated further that he had attended as a Director, a meeting of the Port Hope, Lindsay, and Beaverton Railway Board, and begged to report to the Council that as the Board was constituted the municipalities having stock in the road were not fairly represented in proportion to their stock, that this town had £30,000 stock which only entitled it to send one Director, while Mr. Fowler with £10,000 was able by distributing it to be represented himself and also by persons of his nomination; the Mayor recommended the Council to petition the Legislature to amend the law in this respect.

The following Report was received and adopted:

To the Mayor and Town Council of the Town of Peterboro', in Council assembled.

The Committee on Finance and Assessment beg to report as follows:—

That they have enquired into the state of the Finances of the Town as they now stand, and regret much to have to say, that they are in such a condition that your committee are in a perplexity as to which course they would recommend the Council to pursue.

Your Committee find, on examining the last report of the Finance Committee of the last Council, that it is distinctly stated that there would be at the end of the year 1859, a sum of $6,054 for arrears of liabilities which would be required to be paid off by the then succeeding Council.

For this sum your Committee find there is no provision whatsoever made, that this is the balance which, it was calculated would remain to be settled, after applying all the assets and resources of the Town, as far as they would extend, in discharge of its liabilities, and that in fact, the means to pay this balance would have to be raised for this as in ordinary years.

Your Committee, on examining the accounts of the Town as they now stand, find the balance against the Town, as far as they have been able to arrive at it, to be $6,511 70. This will appear from the following statement.

The following are the items on the debit side.

	$ cts.
Balance due by the Town on the Can'a Loan Fund acc't....	517 00
County Rate for 1859.....	1400 00
Debentures and interest.....	1682 00
Balance of School Rate.....	900 00
Arrears of Salaries.....	510 00
Balance due for Law expenses.	292 87
Sundry accounts and claims including Scott & Hopkin's claim, sued for.....	1196 36
Expenses of arbitration on separation of County from Town..	220 00
Notes in Commercial Bank....	2300 00
Making in all.....	$9018 23

From this sum is to be deducted $2,507 52, which sum it is expected, is still likely to be realized from last years resources. The items are as follows:—

	$ cts.
Balance on Collector's Roll, for 1859, likely to be realized.	1200 00
Due from the Clerk of the Market	302 50
Arrears due of Market Stall rents	22 50
Due from W. A. Scott for rent and taxes.....	407 78
Balance in Treasurers hands...	574 74
Making in all.....	$2507 52

This balance of $6,511 71 which is thus left to the present Council to provide for, is nearly two-thirds of the amount at which the assets of last year were estimated by the Finance Committee's report above referred and is so very large that your Committee are at a loss what course to advise the Council to pursue, with a view to its liquidation. It is utterly out of the question to contemplate its being provided for, out of the ordinary ways and means of the year There are so many difficulties in the way that your Committee cannot think of recommending the Council to take any definite course, without first taking advice upon one or two legal points which have presented themselves to them in the course of their investigations.

If your committee are authorized to consult competent legal authority, they will then consider themselves in a position to advise the Council as to what may be deemed most advisable to be done to meet their present difficulties.

Your Committee would beg to call the attention of the Council to the fact that it has been the practice for Councils, when retiring, to leave a large amount of unsettled accounts and other liabilities remaining behind at the end of the year, and that in consequence, it has been found necessary by the succeeding Council, to pay off a considerable portion of those arrears, out of the assets which properly belong to the following year. Thus running the accounts of one year into those of the one succeeding and mixing up the transactions of the two so as to lead to confusion.

Your Committee cannot too strongly condemn this practice, the result of which always has been that it has been found next to impossible to ascertain the proper receipts and expenditure of any one year, not to speak of such a course leading to irregularities, which in many cases render acts of the Council positively illegal.

Your Committee beg leave strongly to impress upon the Council the necessity of confining the transactions of the Corporation as closely as can be within the municipal year, and they would urgently recommend the present Council to keep this in view in the year's business.

Your Committee would also desire to bring before the Council the unsatisfactory way in which the Town collections have been hitherto made. It would appear by the report before referred to, of the Finance Committee of last year, that at the commencement of the year 1859, there was still uncollected upon the Collector's Roll for 1856, $771 49, and it appears, from a return just received from the Collector for 1859 (last year) that he is still $3,200 behind, that being the sum which he calculates will still be realized in full from last year's Roll.

Your Committee hope that the Collection will be better managed this year, and that the Roll will be closed if possible before the end of the year.

Your Committee consider it advisable to bring these matters thus early in the year before the attention of the Council, so that they may be well considered and the necessary preliminary step taken in proper time.

As to the application of Mr. Burnham, touching the notes upon which he states he is liable, your Committee would ask leave to defer reporting definitely upon the matter until they have had proper advice. In reference to the matter of Mr. Bradfield's suit against the Corporation, your Committee have to report, that the Mayor has already instructed Mr. Dennistoun to defend the suit. All of which is respectfully submitted.

C. F. ORMOND.
JAMES RYAN.
IVAN O'BIERNE.
EDMUND CHAMBERLAIN.

Mr. Cluxton, Trustee for the Town, requested to be heard concerning the suit brought in his name against Mr. John Fowler, which was granted.

Mr Cluxton stated that he had not been indemnified by the Council against risk, and also that he had been sued by Mr Fowler on account of the Town, for £4,790 15 0 balance for constructing the Millbrook Branch. The Clerk read to him the resolution on the books affording him indemnity and when asked what more he wanted, no reply was made.

The Mayor upon Mr. Cluxton's withdrawal, informed the Council that he had understood distinctly from Mr. Dennistoun that Mr Cluxton had consented to bring the suit, and was satisfied to leave the matter entirely in Mr. Dennistoun's hands.

Mr. Cluxton asked permission to make further explanations, and upon leave granted, instead of doing so, took advantage of the liberty he had obtained to tell the members of the Council that he had every confidence in them, but none whatever in the Mayor, and repeated that the statement made by the Mayor of his having allowed Mr Dennistoun to proceed, was false. The Mayor called Mr Cluxton to order and reprimanded him for his insolence, and Mr O'Beirne, upon whose motion Mr Cluxton was heard, upbraided him for his presumption.

Mr. O'Beirne moved, seconded by Mr. Chamberlain, That the Treasurer be authorised to pay Mr. William Arnott the sum of fourteen dollars being a debt incurred by him for medical attendance while suffering under a severe wound received while assisting in the arrest of the perpetrator of the late burglary in this Town.—Carried.

Mr. Edwards handed in his securities which were accepted.

The special committee to whom was referred the accounts of Mr. Cumming reported the matters all satisfactorily arranged

The Council adjourned till to-morrow night at 7½ p. m.

TUESDAY, Feb. 28, 1860.

The Council met—his worship the Mayor in the Chair—present, the whole Council.

The minutes of the former meeting were signed.

A By-law amalgamating the offices of Chief-Constable, Collector, Inspector of Licenses and Health Officer and appointing Wm. Cumming to the same was read and passed.

Mr. Walton moved, seconded by Mr. O'Bierne,—That the names of the following persons be appointed as Constables for the Town—Oliver N. Bradley and Henry Billington.

A communication from the order of Good Templars inviting the attention of the Council to the alarming increase in the sale of intoxicating liquors was referred to the Committee on Petitions.

The Council adjourned to Wednesday night at 7½ p. m.

A communication was read from Charles McCarthy, claiming $12 as compensation for loss of time and expenses in coming to Peterboro', as his lot was advertised for sale for taxes when none were due. It was referred to Committee on Finance.

A petition from the Sons of Temperance praying the Council not to lower the price to be paid for Licenses, and to restrict the number of places for the sale of intoxicating liquors, was received.

Moved by Mr O'Bierne, seconded by Mr. Morrow,—That in the event of its being necessary to discontinue the suit now commenced by the Trustees of the Towns of Peterborough and Port Hope against Mr. Fowler in consequence of the withdrawal of the consent of the present Trustees to the suit being carried on in their names, the legal gentleman now in charge of the conduct of the suit is hereby authorized and instructed to take all necessary steps and proceedings whether in Chancery or otherwise, to compel the Trustees to do their duty, it being always understood that the trustees are to be indemnified so far as may be directed by competent authority.

Moved by Mr Ryan, seconded by Mr Harty,—That the new License By-law be now read a first time.

It was moved in amendment by Mr Toole, seconded by Mr Morrow,—That this Council do now adjourn till next Monday evening at 7 o'clock.

The Amendment was carried, six voting for it and five against it.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

SIR,—As you are aware the annual meeting of the Temperance Union Association took place on Tuesday last. It seemed to me that some of the delegates purposely kept aloof from the meeting in order to give the Belmont man who wrote so vehemently some time ago that the Association would never flourish until its management was in other hands—an opportunity of taking the burden on his back, and doing the great things he boasted could be done. Well, now, I hope our piercing friend will be satisfied with his task, and that after tinkering the Constitution of the Association to suit his notions, at every meeting, he will be able to please himself at least, if he does not please anybody else. Strange logic that which argues that because the representatives for one section of the County do not attend, the meetings should be farther removed away from that place; strange, surpassing strange, that men supposed to be clear-headed should be so bereft of common sense. But the next meeting is to be held at Norwood, and I suppose the members from Smith and Monaghan who could not find time to come to Peterboro will go to the most eastwardly point of the County to attend there. Cui bono!

OPENING OF THE SESSION!!

THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH.

Visit of the Prince of Wales.

QUEBEC, 28th Feb., 1860.

This day at 3 o'clock, p. m., his Excellency the Governor General proceeded in State to the Chamber of the Legislative Council, in the Parliament buildings. The members of the Legislative Council being assembled, his Excellency was pleased to command the attendance of the members of the Legislative Assembly, and the House being present His Excellency was pleased to open the Third Session of the Sixth Parliament of the Province of Canada, with the following speech from the throne:—

Honorable Gentlemen of the Legislative Council—Gentlemen of the Legislative Assembly.

I have much pleasure in announcing to you that your joint address of last session, inviting the Queen to visit Canada, has been laid at the foot of the throne, and that her Majesty's most gracious answer will forthwith be placed in your hands. You will see with satisfaction that we may hope for the honor of receiving His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, in such a manner as will prove the loyalty loyalty of all ranks among us.

Negotiations have been carried on by the Postmaster General for securing the transmission through Canada of a large portion of the correspondence between Europe and America. The result of these negotiations has been such as to show that the advantages of the route by the St. Lawrence are fully appreciated. At the same time care has been taken to represent properly to Her Majesty's Government the position and claims of Canada, with reference to the Postal subsidies granted to ocean steamers.

The Commissioners appointed to report on the boundary line between Upper and Lower Canada, have completed their labors, so as to enable you to pass a bill for the settlement of this long pending question.

The Government have received suggestions from many sources with reference to the measures introduced last Session for the Consolidation of the Municipal Law of Lower Canada, and a Bill will be submitted to you which may enable you to effect that important object.

I congratulate you on the issue of the Consolidated Statues of Canada, and of Upper Canada. I trust soon to see the same work completed for Lower Canada, and when this is done we may hope it will be followed by the further assimilation of the laws in force in both sections of the Province.

I desire to call your attention to the expediency of considering the law of debtor and creditor in commercial matters, as it exists both in Upper and Lower Canada, with a view to further legislation on this difficult subject; and I think, too, that the present system of currency and banking deserves your early and serious consideration.

A message will be laid before you for the purpose of facilitating the administration of the Crown Lands.

Gentlemen of the Legislative Assembly:

I shall not congratulate you on having completely terminated our financial difficulties, I think that you will find that the income and expenditure for the year, now have been such as to cause us no fear for the future.

Papers will be laid before you having reference to the consolidation of the public debt, and the successful exertions made by the Minister of Finance, during the recess, with a view of securing this important object.

You will see that the depression under which we have labored has not diminished our credit; but it has forcibly impressed on myself and my advisers the necessity of a strict and rigid economy. It is with this conviction that I ask you again to consider the propriety of making the requisite provision for the Queen's service.

The accounts for the several departments shall be placed in your hands with as little delay as possible.

Honourable Gentlemen and Gentlemen:

It pleased Almighty God, in the last autumn, to bless our land with a plentiful harvest, and we see around us at the present moment the signs of a revival of commerce.

I earnestly pray that these marks of returning prosperity may continue to increase and that our people may have abundant cause to be thankful for the welfare of their country, and the maintenance of law and order. It is at your hands that they expect such amendments and changes as may, from time to time, be needed, but I rejoice to think that few subjects of a broad and important character remain to be dealt with by immediate legislation.

I now leave you to the discharge of your legislative duties.

After the speech some little discussion followed on the subject of a bankruptcy law which Colonel Prince advocated in strong language, after which the Council adjourned.

In the Lower House, after routine proceedings, the following despatch was read:

DOWNING STREET, Jan. 30, 1860.

SIR,—As the two Houses of the Canadian Legislature will soon re-assemble for the despatch of business, it becomes my duty to inform you that the joint address to which they agreed at the close of their last session, was duly presented to the Queen, and was most graciously received by Her Majesty. In that address the Legislative Council and Commons of Canada, earnestly pray the Queen to receive in person the tribute of their unvarying attachment to her rule, and to honour with her presence her subjects in British North America, upon the occasion of the opening of the great Victoria Bridge, accompanied by the Prince Consort and such members of the royal family as it may please Her Majesty to attend on the occasion. Her Majesty values deeply the attachment to her person, and the loyalty of the Crown which have induced the address, and I am commanded to assure the Legislature, through you, how lively an interest is felt by the Queen for the growing prosperity of Canada, in the welfare and contentment of her subjects in that important Province of her Empire, and in the completion of the gigantic work which is a fitting type of the successful industry of the people. It is, therefore, with sincere regret that Her Majesty is compelled to decline compliance with this loyal invitation. Her Majesty feels that her duties at this seat of the empire prevent so long an absence at so great a distance as a visit to Canada would necessarily require. Impressed, however, with an earnest desire to testify to the utmost of her power, her warm appreciation of her Canadian subjects, the Queen commands me to express her hope that when the time for the opening of the bridge is fixed, it may be possible for his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales to attend the ceremony in Her Majesty's name, and to witness those gratifying scenes in which the Queen is herself unable to participate.

"The Queen trusts that nothing may interfere with this arrangement, for it is her Majesty's sincere desire that the young Prince, on whom the Crown of the Empire will devolve, may have the opportunity, of visiting that portion of her dominions from which this address has proceeded, and may become acquainted with a people in whose progress towards greatness Her Majesty in common with Her subjects in Great Britain feels a lively and enduring sympathy.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The annexation of Savoy to France, was debated in the House of Lords. Strong sentiments were expressed against it.

Lord Granville said that Government had assurances that annexation was not now contemplated.

Lord John Russell announced that England had made four propositions to France and Austria, relative to Italy: neither power to interfere without the consent of the four great powers; the French troops to be withdrawn; Venetia to be left to Austria, and the Central Italian States to be left to again express their desires. France agreed to all but the fourth proposition. Austria had not replied, but was objecting to the last two propositions.

THE COMMERCIAL TREATY AND THE BUDGET.

The London Times asks if there are tidings of a mutual disarmament behind this commercial treaty. This very year we shall, perhaps, spend £30,000,000 for naval and military purposes and national defences. This tremendous amount is the price of suspicion. We are, however, going to work and not to fight with France. Yet now we are paying upwards of a million to our friend to get him to shake hands with us, and spending thirty millions in preparations against the possibility of his knocking us down. This cannot be helped, so long as the armaments of France are upon her present scale. The disarmament must be simultaneous if it be to take place, and it is by no means easy to point out a satisfactory mode of effecting it. The Times approves generally of the budget and treaty. If there had been no treaty at all, we must, as free traders, have done, next year or the year after, just what we have done now under the treaty, and the longer we delayed doing it the greater would have been our own loss.

The Herald observes that Mr. Gladstone last night seemed to revel in the difficulties of his position, but cannot congratulate him on his budget. Above two million pound of annuities have fallen in, and where are they? Gone—swallowed up by the commercial treaty—gone in French wines and in Lyons silks, and in Parisian knicknacks. They might have been applied to reduce the war duty on tea and sugar, or to meet the additional two millions required for our naval defences. But that would have been a very vulgar mode of meeting expenditure. The only channel that Mr. Gladstone could devise for the proper dispersement of this godsend is the commercial treaty with France, and into this channel he flings the whole of the amount.

The Daily News says we have got back to the days of grand financial statements and comprehensive budgets. Since the career of Sir R. Peel's legislation came to a stop, we have been living on the capital of a policy which has carried us safe through European revolutions and a Russian war.—Last night the political heir of Sir Robert Peel may be said to have entered upon an inheritance which, in spite of careless guardians, is still the finest fortune in the world. In defending his Budget from the charge of relieving the luxury of the rich at the cost of the comforts of the poor Mr. Gladstone declares that beneficient legislation consists not in taking a penny or twopence off tea and sugar, but rather in striking the fetters from industry and expanding the field of labour. This memorable Budget is, in a word, a Budget of principles, not of expedients; decisive as an onward movement, but sound in its calculations and safe in its results.

The Star says the Budget completely justifies its confident expectations. The grand characteristic is the remission of the four millions of indirect taxation, by the abolition or reduction of customs or excise duties on nearly 400 articles. All the more agreeable provisions of the Budget will, of necessity, be permanent, while its obnoxious requirements may terminate with the ensuing year. It is the power of Parliament to remove the ten millions of taxation now to be imposed by retrenching the expenditure.

All the journals extol Mr. Gladstone's speech. The Herald says no living Englishman could have put so imposing a front on what it terms a hopless project. The Daily News says he never gave a more masterly proof of close and pressing logic, vigorous conciseness of expression, and clearness of arrangement.

The Peers' gallery was so crammed that Lord Derby himself was obliged to stand during the delivery of the speech.

J. H. Cohn of London, in the East India trade, has suspended. Liabilities £50,000.

The Anglo-Saxon reached Liverpool on the 8th, and the Edinburgh from New York on the 9th.

FRANCE.

The Times' Paris correspondent states that a circular will soon be issued by the new Minister of Foreign Affairs to the French diplomatic agents abroad, and which may be considered in some sort the programme of the Imperial Government on its Foreign policy. It will be couched in sense eminently prudent and friendly to all. It is reported at the War-office, that the order for the French army in Italy to be ready to march at a day's notice has been countermanded.

The Constitutionnel, in an article signed by M. Grandguillot, declares that the signs announced from all parts of France concerning the deplorable effect which has been produced by the letter of the Bishop of Orleans, Monsigneur Dupanloupe (which the Monde insists should be brought before the Tribunal,) imposes on us the duty of not aggravating the existing excitement by such a polemic, and therefore M. Grandguillot says he does not intend publishing the said letter in his principal edition for Paris.

VIEWS OF THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT TO THE ENGLISH PROPOSITIONS.

The Nord to-day publishes the text of the despatch addressed on the 20th ult., to the French Ambassador at London, by M. Thouvenel, Minister of Foreign Affairs, in reply to the propositions of the British Government, as stated in the Queen's speech on the opening of the Session of Parliament. The proposition that French troops quit the Roman States and Lombardy is accorded to by the Imperial Government, on conditions such as that Rome is not evacuated till the Holy See is secure from harm, and Lombardy is free to secure its own interests if they would not be guaranteed by the new organization of Italy. The third point as to Venetia does not excite objections, but it must be left open to consider any compensations which Austria may at a future time offer with regard to Venetia. In treating of the fourth point, that if any new elections the assemblies of Central Italy pronounce in favor of annexation, France and Great Britain shall not oppose the entrance of Sardinian troops, M. de Thouvenel says:—"We regard ourselves bound by previous negotiations upon it with the Austrian court, and we could not to-day, in the presence of the stipulations of Villafranca, pledge ourselves in a formal manner." He adds:—"The reception we have given to the three first propositions will prove the sentiments in which we have received its overtures, and he cannot have any doubts as to our sincere desire to combine for the solution which the situation of Central Italy calls for.

SPAIN.

Madrid, 7th.—Tetuan has been taken by the Spaniards, after a battle which was fought on the 4th. Eight hundred tents, forming the fine encampment of the enemy, the artillery, camels, and all the other equipments of the Moorish army, have been taken.

The brother of the Emperor took to flight, a summons having been transmitted to the enemy to surrender

Within twenty-four hours a deputation from the city came into the Spanish camp to beg for mercy, as the Mussulmen had begun to pillage and slaughter in the town. The division of General Rios entered the place without any opposition, and was received with manifestations of joy.

Immense popular rejoicings are taking place at Madrid, which is splendidly illuminated. The acclamations of great delight are general, and great preparations are being made for public fetes.

It appears that the Moors begun the action of the 31st at 11 in the morning by a fierce attack upon the Spanish advance posts.—They are said to have returned with increased fury to the attack. They closed with the Spanish batalions, and in the hand to hand combat which ensued they were at last defeated, though they obstinately disputed every foot of ground.

In a cavalry charge, ordered by General Galiano, four squadrons found their return intercepted by a body of 2,000 Moorish horse and had to cut their way through. In this way they were aided by the other squadrons sent to their support.

General Prim, with six battalions, stormed a height commanding the field, but had to charge four times with the bayonet before he could gain the position. It was decided to hold the ground thus taken, and artillery was sent up to General Prim in the course of the night. The loss on the Spanish side is reported as considerable, but the number is not given. We hear that a transport arrived this morning at Algeciras with 27 officers and 650 rank-and-file wounded.

ITALY.

It is reported that the Pope was about to excommunicate Victor Emmanuel.

The correspondent of the London Times had been ordered to quit Rome.

It was stated that France had expressed a disposition to withdraw her troops from Rome, provided the Pope consented and engaged to call in no other foreign troops.

The Pope had made another speech extremely hostile to France.

The Austrians were constructing four new forts round Peschiera, and making great military preparations.

A Ministerial crisis was expected at Vienna.

A letter from Milan says:—We continue to receive more and more afflicting news from Venetia. They harvest off from the fortresses of Moravia and the Danube two trains, one of 80 and the other of 100 persons all in chains, who had been arrested on suspicion of feeling love for their country. These individuals have not undergone any formal trial. Fresh arrests are being made in all the towns of Venetia. These towns are still deserted and every day sets of violence are committed. They persist in their acts of provocation in order to force the people to resist by which they would have a pretext for venting their rage on every one.

TURKEY.

MARSEILLES, Feb. 9.

Letters received from Constantinople to the 1st inst., state that general dissatisfaction prevailed in Turkey. The complaints against the administration of the Grand Vizier were increasing, and it was believed that the Sultan will dismiss him on account of his unpopularity.

The Dutch Minister had been insulted by an eunuch in a street of Pera, and had demanded satisfaction.

The Turkish Government has promised to withdraw the paper money from circulation next month.

Information causing suspicions against Prince Danilo had been received by the Porte.

Intrigues of Prince Milosch for obtaining the complete independence of Servia had also been discovered.

Agitation prevailed in Servia. The tranquility of Bosnia and Roumelia was also threatened. The Porte therefore had reminded the Powers of their engagement to defend the integrity of the Turkish empire.

A FAT COUPLE.—The Boston Express says: Mr and Mrs. Annis, residing near the High Bridge of the N. J. Central Railroad are supposed to be the largest couple in this country. The gentleman's weight is 700 pounds, and the lady's weight 700.—Mr. Annis's age is about 45, and Mrs. Annis's about 43. It requires six yards of canimer for Mr. Annis's pants and nine yards cloth for a coat. He and his wife keep a public house at a place called Perth Pebble. It is said that Barnum, of the New York Museum, offered the couple $1,500 per year and their expenses if they would come to New York, but they refused, telling him they did not wish to be hissed at so much. They began to increase in size about seventeen years ago.

MAZZINI ON THE AFFAIRS OF ITALY.

The Glasgow papers publish a letter from Signor Mazzini to his friend, Mr. John M'Adam. Mazzini is again in England, and, as we learn from this letter, occupying himself with the promotion of the cause of Italian nationality:

We are working actively in the south to promote there a change which would reach the aim at once. You helped us, through pecuniary assistance, when we were at work in the north of Italy; help us if you can, for the south. Explain to your countrymen that our aim is unity—that there is the root of the question—that Italy will never be tranquil, Europe never be at peace, whilst that supreme aim of ours is not reached. Urge for support being given to the claimed annexation of the Dukedoms of Tuscany, of the Legations, of Piedmont. Bonapartism is conceding the annexation of the Dukedoms, doubtful about the Legations, negative about Tuscany. And, above all, urge, insist for the withdrawal of the French troops from Italy, but especially from Rome. What is the use of talking of non-interference whilst 20,000 French soldiers are forbidding Rome manifesting her verdict about papal rule? The withdrawal as soon as the Pope's security would be guaranteed was promised since 1849. It was promised again in 1856, on condition that the Austrian troops would withdraw from the Roman provinces. It is asked for by the Pope; it is by the Italian people; and since the war for independence, it is a logical deduction, as, since the peace of Villafranca with Austria, it is an elementary political duty. Ask for it—petition, speak, resolve in every meeting for it. Rome free in Italy one; and the movement now going on amongst your Catholic population ought to stir up your Protestant believers to something like a counter-demonstration. These are the things you might, if willing, do for us. My hour is exhausted, and I cannot write more; I shall as soon as I can.

Believe me, dear friend,
Ever gratefully yours,
JOSEPH MAZZINI.

The Mazzini party was said to be active at Rome. General Goyon had taken measures for preventing any manifestations.

ELOPEMENT OF A MARRIED CLERGYMAN.

The Rev. William Prosser, late curate of St. Nicholas's Church, Durham who had achieved considerable popularity as a preacher, and had long been regarded as a pattern of piety, was married a little more than a year ago to an accomplished, amiable young lady, and for some time lived very happily together. The incumbent of the parish occupies the post of Chaplain to the Durham Penitentiary. In the course of his ministrations the young divine, as assistant to the incumbent, made frequent visits to this refuge of female frailty, and, as it proved by subsequent events, one of these females succeeded in establishing an influence over him which has led him to abandon his wife and home. After the girl left the Penitentiary she was for a short period in the service of Mr. Prosser, where, it would appear from certain correspondence which has since been discovered, a criminal intimacy sprung up between them. Upon the reverend gentleman's recommendation she was afterwards taken into service at Crozdale Parsonage. Latterly Mr. Prosser has been in a highly nervous and excitable state of mind, and being on terms of intimacy and friendship with the Rev. Henry Chaytor, of Crozdale, he went over on a visit, ostensibly for a change of air and rest. While residing there his improper intimacy with the servant was found out, and the discovery was, of course, speedily followed by his dismissal from his curacy. On the same day the degraded curate and his paramour went off together in a fly to Ferryhill Station, and proceeded southward on the North-Eastern Railway. As may be supposed, this disgraceful affair has excited the most intense astonishment. Mr. Prosser's supposed piety and zeal had rendered him an especial favorite, and it was only on the Saturday before Christmas day that the young ladies connected with the Bible Class presented him with a writing case and inkstand as a mark of their respect and esteem. —Manchester Guardian.

☞ As Mr. Albert Rand, with his wife and three children, were driving over the ice on Lake George the horse and sleigh suddenly went through a crack in the ice. The cries of the sufferers were not heard, although they were within a short distance of a house on the shore, but Mr. Rand succeeded in saving his wife and one child. The other two were drowned.

Sympathy with the Pope.

MEETING AT MONTREAL !!!

(Abridged from the Transcript.)

On Sunday last, an aggregate meeting of the English speaking Catholics in Montreal was held in St. Patrick's Church for the purpose of expressing their sympathy with His Holiness Pope Pius IX. Some considerable time before the hour fixed for the Meeting, the vast edifice was completely crowded with a congregration of both sexes, but before the proceedings commenced the fairer portion withdrew.

The platform was erected within the Sanctuary, and at 4 o'clock the Lord Bishop of the Diocese was requested to preside over the meeting. His Lordship was supported by many influential gentlemen of the city, among whom we noticed the Hon. L. T. Drummond, M. P. P., B. Devlin, Esq., C. T. Palgrave, Esq., Marcus Doherty, Esq., M. P. Ryan, Esq, F. Cassidy, Esq., J. C. Quane, Esq., and other gentlemen.

After the strains of the splendid organ had been heard, with the most soothing effect upon the vast assemblage, it was addressed in English by His Lordship the Bishop Coadjutor, Monseigneur Larocque, who said that the affection the Bishop of Montreal entertained for the people confided to his spiritual care was amply repaired by the zeal with which the Roman Catholics of his large diocese, and especially the congregation of St. Patrick's Church, had testified their affection to the Supreme Pontiff of the Catholic world. They at the same time did not permit their zeal to interfere with that christian and peaceable demeanor which became the followers of Christ. His Lordship the Bishop of Montreal had on that day attended the meeting (though in contravention to the advice of his medical adviser), for the purpose of showing his full appreciation of the holiness of their cause, which was in conformity with the pastoral letter announced in that church before. The principle which they came to maintain was to protect the Vicar of the Roman Catholic Faith, (so far as their peaceable views enabled them) from the opposition for a moment of desertion by his faithful children.—They came to express their sympathy with him in the hour of affliction, because his enemies were hurling evil against him. He added that his entire confidence in the promoters of that meeting would not permit him to detain them by any further remarks.

B. DEVLIN, Esq., moved the first resolution. He said that the appearance of so vast a meeting, in a church consecrated to the services of the Creator—assembled as they were for the purpose of opposing certain political movements—might arouse some feelings of surprise in a certain class of persons. But let the public understand that the Roman Catholics of Montreal were the sincere adherents to the faith, of which Pius the IX. was the visible head on earth—are determined by every lawful means to oppose the sacrilegious attempts of those who would rob him of his rights. No Pontiff had ever sat in the chair of Peter more eloquent than the present Pope. Mr. Devlin, in support of these assertions, brought forward several proofs from the London Times, the works of certain Protestant authors of the highest authority at the present time; also from a meeting held a short time ago in New York; all of which he maintained, proved to a demonstration that no title was more valid than that of the Roman Pontiffs to the ecclesiastical states. Mr. Devlin proceeded to expatiate on the liberality of those Protestants of New York, who in respect and affection towards the present Pope, carried at a public meeting held for the purpose, a vote of congratulation upon the mild firmness of his Government. The speaker then quoted some documents from the trial of Mazzini, which, he said, established the fact that Mazzini—the leader of the present movement against the Pope, and the promoter for many years past of such movements—was an assassin. The speaker quoted the remarks of the Count Montalembert, a peer of France, who declared that the followers of the Cross would never yield to the disciples of Voltaire. He summed up by a description of the Emperor Napoleon, who was formerly a member of a secret society of the revolutionists; and from this the speaker drew the conclusion that fear of the terrible oath of Mazzini's party had rendered the Emperor afraid, and that this fear was the reason of his adherence to the enemies of the Papal throne; also, that the experience of 1,000 years had sufficiently proved the utter impossibility of overthrowing Papal authority; that persecution had often been the lot of true Roman Catholics, and that they had been accustomed and trained to persecution. Mr. Devlin then proceeded to move the first resolution to the following effect:

"That the energy and consistency with which His Holiness Pope Pius IX. has always, since his happy elevation to the Papal Chair, pursued the career of rational reform under the most adverse circumstances, and the unremitting exertions of his Holiness to promote, the material, intellectual, and spiritual well-being of his immediate subjects, and to develope the material resources of his dominions, justly entitles him to the respect and love of the civilized world."

G. E. CLERK, Esq., Editor of the True Witness, seconded the resolution in an elegant address, to the same effect as Mr. Devlin.

Mr. DOHERTY proposed the second resolution.

"That the actual condition of the Sovereign Pontiff, harassed as he is on all sides, by the rebellion of a portion of his ungrateful subjects, by the intrigues of foreigners, and the treacherous counsels of powerful and ambitious princes, jealous of his authority—is well calculated to excite in the bosoms of all true Catholics an ardent sympaty with the venerated and beloved head of their church upon earth."

Mr. PALGRAVE spoke to the resolution. He observed that the present occasion elicited his entire sympathy. He had not the honor of being exactly one of the Irish Roman Catholics of Montreal; being, however, an Englishman and a Roman Catholic, he felt himself among his friends, for Roman Catholics are the same, united in the same faith, all over the world. He concluded by seconding the second resolution.

Hon. L. T. DRUMMOND came forward to move the next resolution. He said that from a severe attack of illness, he was necessarily absent from the church until the moment the meeting was held. True Pius IX. was the Vicar of Christ, and certainly his kingdom was not of this world; but the rights of individuals should be respected; and when the Pope held in trust, as he did, territories, legally and justly placed in his hand by indisputable titles down to these times, he (Mr. Drummond) did not see why such rights should be invaded. No; it was the duty of Roman Catholics to proclaim their abhorance of such attempts. The great link which bound together the States of Italy and the Continental Catholic Powers was the Roman Catholic faith. For they had amongst them feuds and rivalries handed down from olden times, from father to son, and the purity and integrity of that faith of which he (Mr. D.) believed Pius IX. the head on earth, should be cherished by those who believe in it, and the temporal possessions which help its progress on earth should be held sacred. Unquestionably, the Emperor of France was a great conqueror, and he was (continued the speaker) perhaps the greatest conqueror of modern times—at least, he had attained more conquests than any living man. But, like his uncle, Napoleon the First, he might find that interference with the Pope would terminate in his ruin. He hoped better things of Napoleon III. He trusted that veneration for the chair of the Apostles would prevent any aggression against the lawful authority of the Pope as a ruler, and he expressed his conviction that not only the hearts but the hands of true Catholics would defend the Pope from the violence of his enemies. Mr. D. trusted that respect for the sublime faith of which the Pope was the venerable head, would awaken in the mind of the Emperor, a feeling regret for any disrespect shown, and induce an adherence to Pius IX. for the future, as the great sovereign and head of the Roman Catholic Church. Mr. Drummond concluded by moving the following resolution:—

"That the heroic courage by which his Holiness has refused to give his assent to the spoilation of the Holy See, and the Christian dignity with which he has maintained the rights of his successors, are worthy of the highest admiration; and that Catholics would be wanting in gratitude towards the Holy Father were they not to testify to him their appreciation of his noble conduct."

Mr. Cusack seconded the resolution.

M. P. Ryan, Esq., in a few impressive words, moved the fourth resolution as follows:—

"That an address be drawn up in conformity with the foregoing resolutions, and that it be transmitted through the hands of his Lordship Mons. Bourget, Bishop of Montreal, to his Holiness Pope Pius the IX."

Mr. Cassidy seconded the resolution.

All the resolutions were passed unanimously.

George E. Clerk, Esq., then moved that the Chair now vacated by his Lordship, should be occupied by B. Devlin, Esq., the President of the St. Patrick's Society.

His Lordship having reported his unanimous resolutions to the kneeling assemblage, they slowly dispersed.

CRUELTY on BOARD AMERICAN VESSELS.

A very revolting case of cruelty on shipboard has recently been brought to light before the magistrates of the Isle of Wight, in England. The American barque Anne, from New York, had on board several negroes among the crew. The testimony of one of them before the Court was that the first and second mates had been guilty of causing the death of six of them during their passage to England. There was, according to the testimony, one named Armstrong, who was ordered to perform some service by the mate, and not doing it as quickly as the mate wished, he struck him on the head with a mallet. Armstrong fell on the deck, and, on being taken up by the witness, he noticed that his eye was running out! He could not speak. The second mate sent him down to the martingale, under the bowsprit, to clear the ear-ring. He could not do it, but fell off the martingale, and with his arm around the ear-ring was towed along in the water, but at last, by the order of the mate, the ear-ring was cut, and the man was lost. There was another colored man named Turtle, who was thrown upon the deck, stamped upon, and his skull broken. The following is the story of the witness:—

"Hires caught him by the head, hauled him down on the deck, and stamped upon and kicked him on the head with his sea-boots, which were very hard. I saw Turtle's head and eyes bleeding. Hires went aft, I went to breakfast, and Turtle went down into the forecastle. After breakfast Hires said to me, "Is Jack Turtle turned out?" I replied, "No." He said, "Tell him if he don't come out and get on the pump, I'll murder him." I went down and found Turtle in his bunk, apparently much bruised. When I told him to get up, he said he could not. I said, "If you don't get up, the mate will come and beat you." Turtle replied, "I can't get up if they kill me." Soon afterwards, Hires pulled him out of the bunk by the ears, threw him down in the forecastle, and stamped upon him heavily. Hires got off Turtle, and said to him, "Now get out and go to the pump." Turtle made no reply, and Hires then picked him up and bore him on to the main deck. The ship was on the port tack, laying over on the starboard side. Turtle caught hold of a rope yarn on the main hatch; Hires kicked him under the left ear, took out his knife and cut the rope yarn, and let Turtle fall into the lee scuppers, where the water was about two feet on deck. I said "I am not going to let this man lie and die here in this way," and took Turtle to the forecastle, where I laid him down. He did not speak; he was helpless; and his head was all in a gore of blood. About two minutes afterwards, Hires asked me "Jack, is that old nigger dead yet?" I said, "No, sir, but he's pretty bad off." This was about twelve o'clock at noon. I attended on Turtle until ten o'clock the same night. He did not speak the whole time, and was unable to take anything. At four o'clock the next morning, I found him dead on the floor."

Another man, also colored, was thrown down by Hires, choked until blood ran out of his mouth, and died the same day. Another man called Frank, was beaten with a "belaying-pin" until, in agony of delirium, he died the next night.

A Mr. Stokes appeared for the prisoners on behalf of the United States government, claiming that the English court had no jurisdiction, the crimes alleged having been committed by American subjects on the high seas, and beyond a certain distance from the British shore. The magistrate sustained the objection, discharged the captain and mates who were under arrest; and not only that, but sent the witnesses back to the ship, to take their chance of similar treatment, before reaching this side of the Atlantic.—The case has naturally excited considerable sensation in England, and led to the expending of a vast amount of indignation at the present state of this particular part of international law. To what extent the witnesses may have exaggerated the facts, if at all, there is no present means of knowing; nor is it likely if the murders as described were really committed, the parties, who escaped justice in England, will run the risk of the gallows in the United States. It is said, on the part of the master of the ship, that the death of the negroes was owing to yellow fever. And the New York papers say it is not well to give entire credence to the details of the testimony until the matter shall have come before the American tribunal. The London Times, on the other hand, draws from this, and many other similar instances, the inference that some change has come over the American people, and that they are sinking into barbarism and cruelty. Remarking upon which the Boston Atlas and Bee says, and perhaps with truth, "There are many reasons why our merchant marine is not what it should be. Its growth has been rapid, the tonnage having doubled since the year 1847, and the result is that in many cases both officers and sailors are unfitted for their places. There are many discreditable cases of cruelty among American merchammen, and this seems to be a very aggravated case, but we hope the facts will fully appear hereafter, and we cannot refrain from expressing the wish that something may appear to remove the imputation of this now apparent inhuman and cold-blooded barbarity."

HOW WE DID IT AND THE RESULT.

From the Scientific American.

We have had large experience, extending over many years, in transplanting young trees; and having learned a method which is almost invariably successful, we purpose to communicate it fully and clearly to our readers, very large numbers of whom are interested to a greater or less extent in the matter. Out of the first hundred trees that we bought, we lost thirty, and since that time we have transplanted several hundred in a season without loosing a single one. This is our plan:—Dig a hole two and a half feet square, and ten inches in depth, leaving the sides perpendicular and the bottom level, or with the edges a little lower than the middle. As the dirt is thrown out, have it best up fine with the back of the shovel. Set the tree into the hole so that the roots will lie in their natural position without being bent, and if the hole is too big for the tree, let a shovel-full of earth be thrown into the middle to raise the tree to a proper hight. Let such parts of the hole be filled as are not occupied by the roots, care being taken to avoid bending the roots, or having them considerably covered with the soil. Now let two pails of water be poured into the hole, and while the tree is held in an upright position, let the assistant sift the fine dirt from his shovel slowly into the water. While this process is going on, the person who holds the tree should change his position to different sides of it, by which means he will be able to get it perfectly perpendicular. After the tree has stood for half an hour it may be examined, and if it leans at all, it may be brought to an erect position by pressing it over with the hand, and at the same time pressing the earth with the foot against the proper side of the roots. This method deposits the earth upon the roots in a manner somewhat analogous to electrotyping, embedding them more perfectly than can be done by any other mode. It also avoids the necessity of supporting the tree with stakes. When the tree is first set in the soft mud, it may be pushed over with the little finger, but after two or three hours, it feels as firm in its new position as if it had grown there.

If the ground is not very rich, plenty of manure should be mixed with the earth about the tree; and in poor soil we have found it very advantageous to prepare a rich border for the tree during its early growth, by digging a hole four or five feet square and two feet deep, and filling it with manure and soil from the surface. It is also a good plan to mix manure with the water which is used in setting the trees. We think as highly as Mr. Downing did of mulching the ground, or covering it with straw to the depth of two or three inches and for a space of four or five feet around the tree. It is just as important to cultivate the ground about young trees as it is about corn; no weeds should be suffered to grow, and a tree might about as well be put into the fire, as to be set in grass land. All young orchards should be highly manured and cultivated. We once saw two acres prepared for a nursery for apple trees in Illinois. The virgin soil was covered three or four inches deep with strong stable manure, and the ground very deeply and thoroughly plowed and harrowed. The grafts (consisting of a scion three inches long spliced to a bit of root four inches in length) were placed in this genial soil, and the ground through the season was thoroughly cultivated, not a weed being allowed to grow. As the grafts were so deeply inserted that only one eye was above the ground, when they were first seen in the spring, a person would not notice that there was anything in the field, but in the fall, five months afterwards, if a tall man walked into the nursery he was so completely hidden by the trees, that it was impossible to see him; so rapid had been the growth.

Large trees also are benefitted by an abundance of manure. In Smithfield, R.I. there is a famous apple tree which has yielded 40 bushels year for several consecutive years, and the secret of its great secundity is found in the fact that a flock of turkeys have roosted in its branches. But the most important thing for trees either young or old, is to keep the ground free from weeds and grass. It is true if the land is very rich indeed, it may bear part of a crop of grass and a moderate yield of fruit, but as a general rule the most unsatisfactory of all efforts of husbandry is the attempt to obtain both fruit and grass from the same field.—Plant potatoes or corn, or anything that requires plowing and cultivation, and the trees will be benefited by it, but let them grow amongst grass and they will present a most mossy, wrinkled and sickly appearance, they will make a very slow growth, and bear very little fruit.

PHONOGRAPHY,
OR
WRITING BY SOUND!!

PHONOGRAPHY was invented by ISAAC PITMAN, of Bath, England, in the year 1837. It is the most simple, most natural, most rapid, and most easily learned system of writing which has ever been, or ever can be invented.

During the past fifteen years, hundreds of thousands of persons, in England and America, in both public and private life, have learned to write Phonography, and thousands of social and business letters annually pass through the post office.

Nor is the great popularity to be wondered at. The present system of writing is exceedingly cumbersome, and totally unworthy these days of progress and invention. Phonography is equally as legible, can be learned in one twentieth the time, and can be written six times as fast! In other words, the labor of six days can be performed in one—one man can do the work of six. So simple is the system, too, that a person may learn to write it slowly, in a couple of hours. An hour's daily practice for a few weeks will enable any person to write Phonography with certainty, and with some degree of freedom. The same amount of practice continued for six months will enable a person to take reports of speeches, lectures, sermons, or conversation, and to read them with accuracy.

The late Hon. THOS. H. BENTON, upon being presented with a verbatim report of one of his masterly speeches, taken by a little boy only twelve years of age, said: "Had this art been known 40 years ago it would have saved me 20 years hard labor." The learned senator spoke but a portion of the truth. What long-hand requires six years to accomplish, Phonography will perform in one.

To clergymen, Editors, Physicians, Lawyers, Secretaries, Conveyancers, Law and Medical Students, Lecturers, Printers, School Teachers, Merchants, School Boys and Girls, a knowledge of Phonography is of vast utility. In fact there is no profession or calling in which it is not useful, and no young man's education can be considered complete without it.

During the past 9 months hundreds of persons in Canada, of every pursuit in life, have acquired the Art, from many of whom the subscriber has received neatly-written phonographic letters, expressive of their delight with the attainment, and the extraordinary ease with which they have acquired it.

For the purpose of aiding in the dissemination of so important a reform in his own country, the subscriber is now prepared to supply all who apply, with the MANUAL OF PHONOGRAPHY, and the PHONOGRAPHIC COPY BOOK, sent by mail to any part of the Province, postage pre-paid, for the small sum of ☞ ONE DOLLAR.

Anybody and everybody, who can learn anything, can learn PHONOGRAPHY from the MANUAL without other assistance. Those who wish to be able to put their thoughts to paper at the rate of from 100 to 250 words per minute, should send for the above-mentioned works at once. The instruction given by the Manual is as plain as A. B. C., and ten times as easy to understand.

STARTLING BUT TRUE!
SURVIVE OR PERISH.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.

The history of this great remedy is the most wonderful medical revelation that the world has ever known. It is not a history written by one man, or even derived from the experiences of one nation, but consists of a compilation of testimonials from the sick of every country—a record, the like of which has never been adduced in favour of any discovery or invention since time began.

BILIOUS DISORDERS.

In whatever form disease attacks the liver, it is repelled and exterminated by the searching, painless and irresistible curative.

Let the sick whom the faculty have abandoned resort with confidence to this nutritious agent, and a restoration to health and activity will be the unvarying result.

DYSPEPSIA.

The great scourge of this continent yields quickly to a course of these antiseptic Pills and the digestive organs are restored to their proper tone; no matter in what hideous shape this hydra of disease exhibits itself, this searching and unerring remedy disperses it from the patient's system.

GENERAL DEBILITY AND WEAKNESS.

From whatever cause, lowness of spirits, and all other signs of a diseased liver, and other disorganisation of the system, vanish under the eradicating influence of this all powerful antiseptic and detergent remedy.

SICKLY FEMALES

Should lose no time in trying a few doses of this regulating and renovating remedy; whatever may be their complaint, it can be taken with safety in all periodical and other disorganisations; its effect is all but miraculous.

Holloway's Pills are the best remedy known in the world for the following diseases:

Asthma,	Headaches,
Bowel Complaints,	Indigestion,
Coughs,	Influenza,
Colds,	Inflammation,
Chest Diseases,	Inward Weakness

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.

CONSOLATION FOR THE SUFFERING.

Nearly fifty years continual use in every part of the habitable globe, amongst the savage and the civilized alike, has proved that simple eruptions, open sores, hard tumors, scrofulous developments of all kinds, abscesses, cancers, old wounds, and, in one word, every species of inflammation and suppuration, whether in the skin, the flesh, the glands, or among the muscles, can be arrested and permanently cured, without danger, by rubbing in and using as a dressing, this incalculable Ointment.

SCROFULA, ERYSIPLAS, AND SALT RHEUM, ERUPTIONS OF THE SKIN, PILES, AND FESTULA,

No remedy has ever done so much for the cure of diseases of the Skin, whatever form they may assume, as this Ointment. No case of Salt Rheum, Scurvy, Sore Heads, Scrofula or Erysiplas, can long withstand its influence.

BAD LEGS, OLD SORES, ULCERS, &c.

Cases of many years standing that have pertinaciously refused to yield to any other remedy or treatment, have invariably succumbed to a few applications of this powerful unguent.

Arising from a bad state of the blood or chronic disease, are eradicated, and a clear as transparent surface regained by the restorative action of this Ointment. It surpasses many of the cosmetics had other toilet appliances in its power to dispel rashes and other disfigurements of the face.

Every form and feature of these prevalent and stubborn disorders is eradicated loosly and entirely by the use of this emollient; warm fomentations should precede its application. Its healthy qualities will be found to be thorough and invariable.

Both the Ointment and Pills will be used in the following cases:

Bunions,	Skin Diseases,
Burns,	Swelled Glands,
Chapped Hands,	Sore Legs,
Chilblains,	Sore Breasts,
Fistula,	Sore Heads
Gout,	Sore Throats,
Lumbago,	Sores of all kinds,
Mercurial Eruptions,	Sprains,
Piles,	Stiff Joints,
Rheumatism,	Tetter,
Ringworm,	Ulcers,
Salt Rheum,	Venereal Sores,
Scalds,	Wounds of all kinds.

IS pleasantly situated at the head of ST. PAUL STREET, amongst the largest wholesale houses in the city. It has (with business men generally, and especially with the best Merchants of both Provinces) become in great a favorite, that it is now acknowledged to be THE Business Hotel of Montreal. To meet the extensive increase, during the last year in the business of the house, the proprietor has built a large addition. The Dining Room has been extended and made more commodious; there have been completed in the new wing, a great number of well-ventilated sleeping rooms, and the House throughout has been refitted, and now contains many improvements and conveniences hitherto unknown in its genus. The whole of the beds have, at a great expense, been furnished with NEW SPRING MATTRASSES. The Proprietor expects that by continuing his personal management of the concern, THE ALBION, as any host of it, will continue to be, as it now is, the best Dollar and a half Hotel in Canada.

THE MAN I LIKE.

I like the man in any sphere,
He his possessions what they may,
Who owns the password "persevere,"
And sets, plus manfully away,
Nurs'd on the downy lap of ease,
Or toss'd upon the sea of fate,
I like the man whom trifles please,
Whose mighty love still conquers hate.

I like the man who never broke,
A promise to the heart or ear;
I like the man who never spoke
A word unkind or insincere;
I like the man whose cautious skill
In channels of good works doth run;
I like the man whose iron will
Yields not till such good works are done.

I like the man who never caus'd
A low or slanderous tale to bear;
I like the man who never caused
A virgin's sigh, a virgin's tear;
I like the man who ne'er belonged
To any vain or foolish creed;
I like the man who never wronged
A brother e'en in thought or deed.

I like the man whose thoughts are pure,
Who wears within a noble breast,
A noble heart trained to endure
And eye in sorrow hope the best;
Who promptly, heartily forgives
E'en as he hopes to be forgiven;
An earnest, holy life who lives
At peace with man, at peace with heaven.

The Gambler's Fate.

Drizzle, drizzle, drizzle, fell the rain and sleet of a cold December night on the cheerless and foggy streets of London. Notwithstanding the hour of midnight had long since struck, and the unpropitious state of the weather, there were still numerous pedestrians abroad, the majority of whom appeared to be bending their steps in the same direction, that of Newgate. But why this concourse of people abroad on such a night, at such an hour? Did the chill blast, the pitiless storm and dreary prospects without, offer greater inducements than the blazing hearth and well spread couch of repose?—They would not probably have done so under any other circumstances; but morbid curiosity is a powerful investigator, and capable of achieving almost any triumph over its ravenous votaries.

The following morning was set down for the execution of one Alfred Hale, a notorious gambler, who had been recently convicted of the murder of one of his associates, resulting from a dispute over the card table. It was with a view of beholding this awful spectacle, and one as necessary as it is horrid, that the countless throng of pedestrians aforementioned forsook the comforts of home, and sallied forth to battle the elements on so wretched and stormy a night as ever destroyed a chimney-pot or dislodged a sign-board. Onward and onward trampled the eager multitude, all heedless of the storm and fog—which at this time was at its height—and filled only with the thoughts of the "great sight" which was to reward the labor of their journey. At length the posterous walls of Newgate rise in the distance, and elevated a few feet above their summit smacks the instrument of death gaping for its prey.

Gathered together in small groups, and scattered in every direction round that stronghold of offended justice, stands the voracious herd impatiently awaiting the approaching dawn. Various were the opinions expressed by the different knots of gossipers as to the justness of Hale's sentence. 'There was Tom Wrench and Jack Pickbeck—two as notorious villains as ever existed unhung—both engaged in denouncing the culprit in the strongest terms possible.

"I tell you what it is, muttered Jack Pickbeck to his mate, "the sooner such cattle as him is swung up the better it'll be for the world, and the more respectabler it'll make our profession! eh, Tom?"

Tom remained silent for a moment, then thrusting his hands into the pockets of his unmentionables, and drawing up his slender figure to its full height, he replied, deliberately:

"John Pickbeck, you allers talk like a Christian and look like a saint, and sam'd if don't believe you'll turn out priest by and by; but that ain't no matter; I mean to say, John Pickbeck, that all such scamps as this fellow Hale, oughter be suspended.—They say every dog's got his day, and as long as these scoundrels will keep suspense and upheaval; and won't mind the famine what their scriptures teaches 'em, why they've got for to take the consequences, that's all."

"Just my 'pinion, Tom Wrench," rejoined his companion; and with these words the two speakers walked away.

There gave many others among the crowd quite contradictory opinions in regard to the justice of the prisoner's sentence, than those expressed by John Pickbeck and his associate. Many appeared to sympathize with him, and strongly denounced the severity of his punishment, although their professions of sympathy, and the opinions they manifested to witness the execution, were remarkably inconsistent, to say the strongest term.

Leaving the scene to the free interchanges of their considerable opinions, we will draw aside from the noisy and confusion contending throng in their midst, and briefly review the life of the condemned.

Alfred Hale was the only son of respectable and wealthy parents, from whom he received the benefit of considerable education; and on coming of age, he entered into the possession of a large fortune, which not only was, he soon to be young, but the daily increased by dividends and annuities. Being an only child, and possessed of a handsome person, and a pleasing address, he soon became a favorite in the fashionable circles of the neighborhood in which he resided. In every assemblage of the kind he was sought after by the young ladies, and was considered a most desirable match by the mothers of marriageable daughters. In short, he was the pet of the fashionable world, and was considered by many as the luckiest fellow in existence. Such was the position of Alfred Hale at the age of twenty-one, by the demise of his parents, which left him sole heir to their immense property. Being of a kind and generous disposition, he was ever ready to assist the needy and unfortunate, and many were the applications for charity that were made to him. Among the many who sought his assistance, was a young man who had been a fellow-student with him at college, and who had been left destitute by the death of his parents. Hale, who had always entertained a great regard for him, immediately sought him out, and finding that he was in great distress, he generously relieved him from his embarrassments, and placed him in a situation where he could support himself comfortably. This young man was a gambler, and by his influence Hale was induced to visit the gaming table, where he soon became initiated into the mysteries of the game, and was induced to play. Fortune favored him at first, and he won considerable sums of money, which only served to increase his desire for play. He now frequented the gaming table every night, and was generally successful in his play, and his winnings were very large. Thus he continued for some time, when his luck began to change, and he commenced losing. He still continued to play, and lost large sums of money, which he was unable to pay. He was then obliged to sell out his property, and pay his debts of honor. He was now reduced to poverty, and was obliged to seek employment. He obtained a situation as clerk in a mercantile house, but his former habits of dissipation still clung to him, and he was frequently absent from his duties. He was at last discharged, and was again reduced to poverty. He now became desperate, and resolved to make one more attempt to retrieve his fortunes. He went to the gaming table, and played with the most determined resolution, but was unsuccessful, and lost all he had in the world. He was now in a state of frenzy, and was determined to have money at all hazards. He went to the house of his former friend, and asked him to lend him a sum sufficient to enable him to commence gambling again. His friend refused, and Hale, in a fit of passion, struck him a blow which killed him on the spot. He was arrested, tried, convicted, and sentenced to be executed.

On looking up, he beheld the countenance of his spiritual adviser, who bade him in a tone tremulous with emotion, to arise and devote the remaining hours allotted to him on earth to prayer and supplication.

"Great God!" exclaimed the culprit, clasping his hands in despair; "is it all a dream? Am I lost? Why, why have I sinned!"

As he spoke, the tears of soul-wrung anguish gushed from his eyes, and he groaned aloud with agony. Slowly he arose from his couch, and, with the aid of his attendants, dressed himself for the last time.—This accomplished, he knelt down beside the chaplain, and if ever man poured out heart and soul in prayer, he did them. In this manner an hour passed away, and as the clock struck seven he rose from his kneeling posture, and, turning to those around him, exhorted them in the most earnest manner to shun the gambling table as they would Satan himself, whose altar it was.

"Should temptation," he continued, deeply affected, "ever lead you towards it, think of me and, turn resolutely from its presence. Think of him who fell through its accursed influence, and flee ere it be too late."

At length the fatal moment arrived, and such a moment as it was to the condemned we shrink from depicting. His arms were now pinioned; and all arrangements being completed, the procession moved on in the direction of the scaffold. At this juncture the chapel bell of the jail began its slow and solemn peal, and rendered the proceedings even more dismal than before.

By this time the rain had somewhat abated, and the number of spectators had increased to many thousands. Every window, house-top and other available spot was crowded to suffocation, not only by by men, but (and we blush to say it) also what appeared to be respectable women. The tumult and confusion which every where prevailed, was unparalleled in the history of public executions.—Among the vast sea of human heads there assembled, might have been recognized representatives of every clique, grade and profession of which the metropolis could boast. There was the grey-haired man, trembling on the verge of the grave, and the precocious youth of a dozen summers; the feeble and palsied woman, and the girl just bordering on her teens. What a lamentably depraved and vicious taste must that have been which drew together a multitude like this, to witness the dying agonies of a fellow-being, to feast upon his torture, and gloat over his miserable end! What language is adequate to condemn an appetite so morbid as that which prompted the gathering of this horror-loving mass? We shrink with abhorrence from the task, as one which belongs rather to devils than to men. However vile and debauched a culprit may be, he is still human; and his feelings should be regarded; for, although the laws of God and man require the murderer's life as a forfeit of his crime, they do not require that the sacrifice shall be made a source of ridicule for plebeian wonder-mongers.

The gallows was at last reached, and slowly the mournful train ascended the fatal steps. Then followed one of those affecting spectacles which could hardly fail to moisten the eyes long unused to weeping, and melt to pity the callous long dead to sympathy.

So overcome by the occurrences of the past few hours was the hapless felon, that it was found necessary to support him while the rope was being adjusted. All being in readiness, he fervently grasped the hands of the prison officers in attendance, and thanked them again and again for the kindness they had shown him, and, the interest they manifested in his behalf, still exhorting all near him to shun the gambling table and its attendant evils, and begging of them sometimes to remember him and at all times when temptations assailed them, to pause ere they proceeded onward toward the precipice of destruction, and looking backward on his own awful end, take warning by the gambler's Fate.

Another instant the trap was down, the platform fell from beneath his feet; and the unhappy man was writhing in the throes of death.

An hour afterwards the corpse was cut down, and buried within the jail-yard; the crowd dispersed; the law was satisfied, and justice had fulfilled its mission!

ANECDOTE OF NAPOLEON.

As Napoleon was riding out attended by several officers, (I was one of the party,) we rode past a forest where some woodmen were cutting timber. Observing one of them singing, the Emperor with a smile, turned towards us and said:

"Observe that man, who, though toiling hard for his daily bread, seems to be quite happy."

The woodman observing so many persons looking at him, made a respectful bow, and approached us to inquire if we had lost our way.

"No," said the Emperor; but tell me my honest man, what makes you so cheerful? What may you earn a day?"

"Three francs, your honor."

"Three francs?" said the Emperor, "does that support you and your family; tell me how do you manage to do so."

"With pleasure, your honor, if you will step a little this way. With three francs I do not only keep my wife and family, but I also put money out at interest, and pay off my old debts."

"Explain yourself."

"Willingly, your honor. I keep my wife and children—I place money out at interest by educating the latter at school, and pay off my old debts by maintaining my aged father and mother. So you see your honor I may well be happy."

"Excellent man," said Napoleon, "there is a Napoleon for you, tossing him the money. Keep what you have told me a secret. I am your Emperor, and, on pain of my displeasure, I enjoin you to tell no one, till you have seen my face a hundred times."

"Sire, it shall be so."

Napoleon turned his horse's head and rejoined us. The same evening as he appeared very thoughtful. General Rapp asked him if anything unpleasant had occurred that day?

"No," said the Emperor, "but I met a man this morning who, with three francs per day, told me he kept his family, placed money out at interest, and paid off his old debts. Gentlemen," continued the Emperor, "you will please me much if any of you can tell me the meaning of what he said."

All of us were anxious to please our monarch, and knowing that he had spoken to a woodman in the forenoon, we rode off on the following morning, and having found the woodman asked him if he knew to whom he had spoken the previous day. The man said—

"Yes, I had the honor of talking with the Emperor."

"What did you say to him?"

"Excuse me gentlemen, but I must not tell you."

"I will give you fifty Napoleons to tell me," said one of the party.

"No, I dare not," said the man.

"You shall have one hundred if you oblige us," rejoined our companion.

The woodman, after pausing a minute or two, said—

"Place the money in my hands, and then I will tell you."

We placed it in his hands, and after he had carefully examined every piece, he told us all that had transpired. We rode off, and on our arrival at the place, asked to be admitted to the Emperor, whom we expounded his riddle. Napoleon pale with anger, said—

"Bring the woodman before me dead or alive!"

He was soon found, and ushered into the presence of his angry monarch.

"Hiewah, have you dared to break your promise with me."

"Sire," said the woodman, with great composure, "I have not disobeyed your commands."

"How, there!" said Napoleon, "dare you tell me a lie?"

"Sire," said the woodman, "you told me I should tell no one until I had seen your face one hundred times."

Then putting his hands deliberately into his pockets, he laid the pieces of money, one by one, before the Emperor, with the hands upward.

"There, sir," continued he, "have I not seen your face one hundred times."

Napoleon burst into a loud fit of laughter, gave him a slap on the face, called him a clever fellow, and made him a captain of artillery where he proved himself deserving of his good fortune.

VISIT TO A COTTON PLANTATION.

The following interesting particulars of a cotton plantation, &c., are culled from a letter of a correspondent of the New York Herald, who has recently visited the extensive plantation of Colonel Wade Hampton, near Columbia, S. C.:

"The Hampton estate is situated on the Congaree river, and comprises about four thousand acres of bottom and upland. Millwood, the seat of the immediate new occupied by Mr. Hampton is situated on an eminence which commands a fine view of Columbia, the Congaree river and the surrounding country for 25 or 30 miles. It is built in the style of an English manor house studded with sandpoints and wide spreading oaks, and environed in front with a splendid lawn and numerous dower beds. The approach to the house—winding road, is finely shaded with pine trees, magnolias and other evergreens, which give the place an appearance of oriental enchantment. The plantation hands number a little over Millwood, and occupy a row of cabins of twenty two miles. It was purchased from the heirs by Colonel Hampton's grandfather, and still called "Woodlands" by the descendants, for the reason perhaps, that it was formerly an open area in the forest. The original homestead, which was occupied by General Greene during the revolutionary war, for several months, is still standing, and presents quite a respectable appearance yet. Old General Sharpton, as he was called, was the first man who imported cotton from the country, and up to the time of Eli Whitney, was the most successful planter in the United States. When the plant was first introduced to South Carolina, there were great doubts as to its successful culture.—But General Hampton was convinced of the feasibility of the project, and planted nearly 1,000 acres of the seed, while his neighbors were afraid to venture upon more than would grow in their flower gardens.—He was quite successful with his first crop, having gathered about 300 bales, which were sold in Liverpool at a handsome profit. Some of the buildings used in putting up their original bales are yet standing, but the machinery had all been superseded by more modern inventions. Col. Hampton gave us a description of the cotton plant and the manner of its culture. He stated that it was an extremely delicate plant, and was easily killed by frost or storms of wind and rain. It is an annual, and is sown from the seed in South Carolina about the 1st of April. If the weather is warm, the germ appears above the ground in about 48 hours after planting. During the first month of its growth it is subject to be attacked with a very destructive worm, and requires a great deal of care. After growing to the height of from three to five feet, the tree blossoms. The blossoms remain only two days, when they fall off, and a small nut, about the size of a pea, appears. The nut gradually grows larger under the influence of the sun, until it assumes the proportions of a hickory nut. In September, the nut or "boll," as it is called, bursts open, and then the cotton is ripe for picking. The task of picking is a very laborious one, especially on those lands where the plants are below the average height. In poor soil, where the the trees are dwarfish and much stooping is required, picking is no easy task. The negroes are kept closely at work during the picking season, for the loss of a few days sometimes causes the ruin of an entire crop. From the field the cotton is conveyed to the mill, where the seeds are separated from the wool by a machine called the gin. From the gin mill it is sent to the press, where, by means of a large wooden screw, it is compressed into bales, weighing from 400 to 500 pounds, and then transported to market. It was about 11 o'clock in the forenoon when we reached the cotton fields. A number of hands were engaged in picking the late or "rained" cotton, which the trees yielded after the regular picking season is over. This "rained" article is of a very inferior quality, and is used only in the manufacture of the coarsest kind of goods. Nevertheless, on a large plantation it is quite an item of profit, and is carefully husbanded. The cattle are allowed free range of the fields at this season of the year, and might be seen quietly browsing a few yards off the laborers.—Further on we came to a field which was being plowed for the purpose of growing wheat, some 15 or 20 plows being thus engaged. In the barn-yard were some fine specimens of the Brahmin cattle and Cashmere goats which Col. Hampton has had imported expressly for his plantation and at a great cost. The Brahmin cows are noted for their good milching qualities. Some of those I saw have given as much as 30 quarts a day. The bulls are much larger than the native cattle, and are capable of doing heavier work. Of the Cashmere goats there were about 200 on the place.—They are much prized for their wool, as also for the delicacy of their flesh. I must not forget to mention another curiosity I saw. In an enclosure, hard by the barnyard, were three splendid looking elk—one male and two females. The male especially was a noble looking animal, with antlers fully five feet in height. The does were quite tame, but the buck was considered very vicious, and had a bad habit of attacking strangers whenever they approached him."

FRIGHTFUL CALAMITY.—FORTY-NINE CHILDREN DROWNED.

From Mr. Brooks the Editor of the Quincy Herald, we learn that a most terrible calamity, rivaling that of the Pemberton Mills, occurred on Thursday last near the town of Ilardin, Illinois, on the Illinois River, and about twenty-five miles from Alton.

Fifty school children, in attendance at a university, at that place, went out on the ice to play. The ice gave way, and, with one exception all were lost.

Our informant was unable to give further particulars, but represented that the village was a scene of universal mourning, almost every family in it having lost one or more of its members.

A CANADIAN LADY ROBBED IN NEW YORK.

Mrs. Hare, a lady from Ottawa city, C. W., had her pocket picked in Broadway yesterday morning of a wallet containing $6,000. Mrs. Hare is a milliner by trade, and had come to New York to make some purchases, most of which she had concluded on Saturday last. Yesterday morning she left the St. Nicholas Hotel with the $6,000 in her pocket, intending to pay for the goods previously purchased. On arriving at Lord & Taylor's her first stopping-place, she found that her pocket had been cut, and the money abstracted therefrom. The funds were mostly in $5 and $10 Canada money, and the detectives have hopes of recovering the money and detecting the thief.—N. Y. Tribune.

THE STRIKE AT LYNN.

MOVEMENT AMONG THE WOMEN.

In company with the Boston Herald and Journal, the New York Times mounted this top of a rickety omnibus, and took 15c worth of ride over ruts and through mud to Liberty Hall. The streets were thronged with girls of various ages and sizes—some twelve years old, and others forty—some four feet high and two feet round, and others six feet high and five feet round. The corners were crowded with "jeers," who cheered each classy group that passed, saluting them with cries of "Go in, girls,"—"Remember Molly Starks,"—and "Give the bosses fits," &c. Reaching the foot of the stairway, the Times happened to be ahead, and with great difficulty pressed his way through the wholesome and retinue to the top of the steps. Here a venerable lady stopped the entrance, and said in loud voice which attracted the attention of the 400 occupants (all women). "No, sir. No such scenes in here. You have villified us and impugned the purposes of our meeting, and not but one man can come in to-night—but our chairman, Mr Oliver."

The Times was staggered, but in a mild and gentle tone urged that it was not fair to visit the sins of the Boston press upon its Metropolitan head. The vote was taken, and we were allowed to remain, on condition that we would tell the whole truth and nothing but the truth, leaving out what nonsense might be uttered on the spur of the moment.

The object of the meeting was the hearing of reports of committees who had been deputed to make a list of reasonable prices, and to solicit the girls of Lynn and the surrounding towns to join the strike movement.

There are two classes of workers—those who work in the shops and those who work at home—the former on the machines and materials of the bosses, while the latter work on their own machines, or work by hand, furnishing their own materials. It is evident that the latter should receive higher pay than the former, and the report not having considered this fact, was subjected to severe handling. The discussion which followed was rich beyond description—the jealousies, piques and cliques of the various circles being apparent as it proceeded. One opposed the adoption of the report because "the prices set were so high that the bosses would'nt pay them." Cries of "put her out," "shut up," "crabby" and "cheese!" arose on all sides; but while the reporters were alarmed, the lady took it all in good part, and made up faces at the crowd. The chairman stated that, hereafter, Pickleocasein boots were to be made for three cents a pair less, which announcement was received with expressions of dismay, whereupon he corrected himself, and said that they were to be three cents higher, and this announcement drew forth shouts and sequence of applause. "There, did'nt I say so?" said an old lady behind me. "You shut up," was the response of her neighbor; "you think because you have got a couple of machines you're some; but you ain't no more than anybody else." At this point some one peeped in at the window,—"Scat cat!, and put 'em out," soon drove them away, and the meeting went into a committee of the whole, and had a grand clabbering for five minutes. Two ladies, one representing the machine interest, and the other the shop girls, became very much excited, and were devoting themselves to an expose of each other's habits, when the chairman, with the perspiration starting from every pore, said in a loud and authoritative tone: "Ladies! Look at me; stop this wrangling. Do you care for your noble cause? Are you descendents of old Molly Stark or not? Did you ever hear of the spirit of '76? (Yes, yes, we've got it.) Well, then, do behave yourselves. There aint nobody nowhere who will say you if you don't show 'em that you're regular built MollStarks ever agin." Cheers, clappings, &c.

"Here comes the Boston police!"—"Pitch 'em in the river;" "Whose afraid?" "We'll put 100 girls at the depot, and then see if the police dare arrest anybody."—What could the Chairman do? He hammered and yelled "Order," but had to succumb and let the girls talk it out, when they again came to order and resumed business.

A proposition to march in the procession was the next topic which drew forth discussion. Some thought that proper minded women would better stay at home than be gadded about the streets following banners and music. To this there was some assent, but when a younger girl raised the first speaker what she meant by talking that way, when everybody in Lynn knew that she had been tagging around on the sidewalks after the men's processions last week, the uproar was tremendous, and the pet of the Bowery never at any performance of the "Three Fast Men" so resounded with screams and whistles and hurrahs as did the well named Liberty Hall.

Some of the statements were quite interesting. A Mrs. Miller said that she hired a machine on which she was able to make $6 per week—out of that she paid—for the machine, $1; for the materials, $1 50; for her board, $2; for bastings, $1; making $5 50 in all, which left her a clear profit of only fifty cents a week. One of the bosses says, however, that if a woman is at all smart she can make $10 per week with her machine, which would be a clear $9, sure. In fact, from remarks which were dropped around, I judge that Mrs. Miller's estimate is rather low. The leading spirit of the meeting, Miss Clara Brown, a very bright, pretty girl, said that she called at a shop that day and found a friend of hers hard of work on a lot of bindings. She asked what she was getting for them, and was told eighty cents for sixty. "Girls of Lynn," said Clara, "Girls of Lynn, do you hear that, and will you stand it? Never, never, never. Strike then—strike at once demand 50 cents for your work when the binding isn't closed, and you'll get it. Don't let them make slaves of you; (Chorus—there are colored persons here.) I mean Southern slaves; keep still; don't work your machines; let 'em be still till we get all we ask and then go at it, as did our brothers in the Revolution."

This speech was a good one; it seemed to suit all parties, and they proposed to adjourn to Tuesday night, when they would have speeches and be more orderly. Committees were appointed to look up female strikers and to report female "scabs." And with a vote of thanks to the Chairman, the meeting adjourned to meet in Lyceum Hall.

The Herald and Journal went into Boston at the close of the meeting, and as the Times was a comparative stranger, a committee of five proposed a ride home—They hurried upon the platform of a car and four, crushing out and more hurt and then with a merry laugh and a promise that they would do as our friends had really undertaken previous at the Brooks House, there was much good natured laughter, and the cars moved off with the girls.—*N.Y. Peterborough a Manufacturing Town.

With the magnificent water power we possess in our noble River Otonabee, it seems marvellous that more has not been done to develope the resources at our command. Surely our whole energies have not been exhausted in the erection of a few Saw and Grist Mills, which no doubt are the main stay of our Town's prosperity at present; but are we to stand still with what has been done? Most assuredly not. A few years more and the logs necessary for manufacturing sawed lumber will be difficult to obtain in this neighbourhood, therefore, as a necessary consequence, our manufacturers of that article will either have to move their establishments in closer proximity to localities where pine lumber abounds, or be obliged to lose the best part of the summair season in driving logs from distant parts on our back waters. This loss of time will render it impossible for the manufacturer to get out logs, drive them to mills in this vicinity, and send the lumber they produce to market, in the same year. The prolonged delays each successive year in getting logs to our Mills proves the correctness of what we state.

With these facts "staring us in the face," we think it is time we were bestirring ourselves to form manufacturing establishments of a less transient nature than that of lumber. With convictions on our mind of the truth of what we state, we would suggest the propriety of establishing Woolen and Cotton Manufactories on our river. We perceive that the people of Toronto are considering the propriety of erecting such establishments in their city, while men of experience there have no hesitation in giving it as their opinion that the undertaking would succeed if properly managed. Now if such is the case with regard to Toronto, that does not possess any suitable water power and must depend on steam as a motor, with how much greater prospects of success might such an undertaking be commenced in Peterboro'. We have an abundant supply of wool in our own neighbourhood, while the Grand Trunk is at present conveying cotton in transit, comparatively speaking, past our doors. If a Joint Stock Company was formed, the "right men" put in the right place to conduct matters, we are satisfied the circulating medium would be forthcoming to form the nucleus of what yet might become the "Lowell" of Canada.

We intend soon to advert to this subject again, and trust in the meantime, our readers will give the matter due consideration.

The Mayor and the Council.

Mr. Morrow moved, and Mr. Toole seconded a motion at the last meeting of the Council, which they explained as intended to take away from the present Mayor the salary voted by resolution of the last Council to future Mayors.

In February, 1859, Mr. Stevenson being Mayor, the Finance Committee reported, that hereafter the allowance to the Mayor shall be $500 a-year. Mr. Morrow and Mr. Toole were then, as now, in the Council, and they, as well as the other members, approved of the report. We shall be glad to hear upon what pretence these gentlemen think this understanding should not, as in Mr. Stevenson's occupancy of the office, be carried out. At the nomination, or at any other time, no objection was made to it by the ratepayers, who are really the parties concerned. Every body was satisfied, and so they are still. The present Mayor attends to his duties, we believe, fully as well as Mr. Stevenson did; but he is not exactly as submissive and as pliant as that gentleman was.—Mr. Stevens looks to the interest of all; Mr. Stevenson to those of a select few; therefore, to reduce the present Mayor to the same state of subserviency as his predecessor, Mr. Morrow and Mr. Toole recommend that he be starved into submission. Mr. Morrow introduced his motion with a mock compliment. He was glad that the Town had now a gentleman at the head of its affairs who is able to work without remuneration. Does Mr. Morrow forget that when Mr. Stevens and Mr. Stevenson were rivals for the office last year, the chief ground for preferring Mr. Stevenson to Mr. Stevens urged by Mr. Morrow as well as his other principal supporters, was that Mr. Stevenson's wealth would convert the Town against all inconvenience on the score of its debt. That Mr. Stevenson's name in the Bank was often much more strength than that of Mr. Stevens, there could be no question as to what would be most able to benefit the Town? As man however, as the pillar of strength was in the chair, the resolution approving the salary was passed, and resolving that upon the other resolution continuously until the party, the salary shall be continued from year to year also. But Mr. Stevenson went out, and a man of a different stamp went in, and immediately Mr. Morrow and Mr. Toole changed their mind about the propriety of salary. The trick it love transparent—these two Councillors need not think to gather popularity by a reconsideration. When the ratepayers desire a salary to be taken away, they will tell the candidates at their election. Until then the two new-fledged economists may console themselves. The salary is the office of the Mayor as now demands greater attention and more management, and it is better to pay a man for his time, than to have some unwilling person like Mr. Morrow draw on the resources of his own pocket to discharge the duties which pertain to the office of Mayor.

THE TRUSTEE AND THE MAYOR.

In another column will be found a communication from Mr. Clinton, which may throw some light on the unfortunate dispute between the latter gentleman and the Mayor. Mr. Clinton claims that in some points our report of the collision in the Council on the night of the 27th ult., was incorrect—We can only remark that while the report published in the Examiner was furnished by an interested party, it agrees with the minutes on the Town Clerk's book, as read before and approved by the Council. Mr. Clinton, we have no hesitation in saying, regrets that he used the language he did respecting the Mayor when addressing the Council on the occasion referred to, and his statement that a misunderstanding existed between him and Mr. Dennistoun in the matter of indemnity, may to some extent explain the cause of the collision between the Mayor and Mr. Clinton.

☞ Our London Correspondence was received last evening, but in consequence of a press of local matters we are compelled to lay it aside till next week. The latest foreign news will be found under the proper heading.

THE FELON FELLOWES—We regret that a man occupying the position of the Hon. M. Cameron should be found seeking on the floor of the House of Assembly the release from imprisonment of scoundrels like Fellowes and his companions. The term of imprisonment is only six months, and before it has half expired members of the House are using their influence with the Executive to secure a pardon for them.—A poor, unfortunate miscreant convicted of larceny is sent to Jail six months and his cries for mercy are only echoed back by the prison walls, but the pleadings of a man convicted of one of the worst crimes of the land, because he once held rank and station, are responded to with sympathy in the halls of our Legislature. We hope the Governor will turn a deaf ear to the unjust appeal, and refuse to exercise his prerogative that the ends of justice may be satisfied.

☞ We are sorry to learn that our worthy representative, Mr. Short, is suffering from a severe indisposition which prevents him for the present attending to his Parliamentary duties. The public will duly understand the spirit which prompted the attack of his miserable maligner, the Review, last week, now that they know the true cause of Mr. Short's absence from public duty.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"Zero"—on our School System—Received too late for this issue. Will appear in our next.

Several problems and solutions are crowded out.

THE HUNGARIAN—There is nothing of particular interest to note of the melancholy wreck. Mr. Talbot and his bride are known to have sailed in the ill-fated ship; of Mr. Wilson and others nothing definite is known. No full list of the passengers has yet been published, but it is stated there were 140 names booked in Liverpool and Cork.

OUR confrere of the Review dismisses his notice of the Reform Association Address in his last issue with nine whole lines. We confess our contemporary has taken the easiest method of getting over the difficulty "the least said the soonest mended," and this seems to be the plan generally adopted by the Ministerial press in reference to the Address. They find it impossible to get over the mountain of overwhelming truths it contains, so with some spiteful illusion they let it pass. Our contemporary, however, tells us that he is quite satisfied that the "first two columns of the twenty-seven will nauseate any one who attempts to read it through." We quite agree with the Review and from different points of view arrive at the same conclusion. We candidly admit that few can even read two columns of the Address without a sickening sense of nausea and loathing when he reflects on the condition to which the few miserable incapables of Upper Canada leagued with a French majority, have reduced this province. We are compelled, however, by the fact that this state of things will soon come to an end. The day of retribution is not far off. Our Governor and his ministers cannot long delay a general election, and ere that period arrives the Reform Convention Address will have carried conviction to the hearts of thousands who previously had only vague and indistinct ideas of our country's wrongs.

TOWN COUNCIL.

MONDAY, March 5th, 1860.

The Council met—the Worship the Mayor presiding. Present—Messrs. Morrow, McDougal, Ormond, Walton, Chamberlain, O'Beirne, Ryan, Tully, Mahony and Whyte.

The minutes of the last meeting were read and signed.

The Mayor informed the Council that Mr. Canning had furnished him with bonds which were then submitted to the Council and approved.

A report from the committee on charity recommending a check to issue to Widow Wagers, for $3, was received and adopted.

A report from the committee on Finance and Assessment representing that Mr. Charles McCarthy's claim for $12 was not just, that $9 was owing to Mr. Tilford, and that the constables were not yet in a position to report on Mr. Barnhart's claim for money said to have been spent on beats by the Bell Ringer during the absence of the ordinary constable.

A petition was presented by Mr. Ormond, signed by persons interested in the preservation of good order in the neighborhood of Mr. Short's private car, praying that no hotel or saloon license may issue to any person in contiguous premises.

A petition from Mr. Hartly and others was presented by Mr. Morrow, praying that the Council would grant a license to Mr. Hartly to keep a tavern in Ashburnham.

Mr. Walton moved, seconded by Mr. Ormond, that the petition be referred to the Committee on Petitions.—Lost.

The first amendment was carried.

Mr. Toole moved, seconded by Mr. Ryan,—That Messrs. Walton, Chamberlain and McDougall be a Committee to fix the Mayor's salary for this year, and to report to the Council at its next meeting.

Mr. Chamberlain moved in amendment, seconded by Mr. Ryan,—That the members of the whole Council be the Committee to recommend the amount of salary to be paid the Mayor during the present year.

Mr. Maloney moved, seconded by Mr. Whyte,—That the Mayor's salary be the same as last year.—Lost.

The first amendment was carried.

Mr. O'Beirne moved, seconded by Mr. Walton,—That the detailed statement of the financial affairs of the past year which the auditors of the Town are in that behalf required to prepare shall set forth in full detail the receipts and expenditures with names, dates and particulars attached to each item, also the standing assets and liabilities of the Town in detail, with names, dates and particulars aforesaid.—Carried.

The Mayor said that he was now in a condition to refute the accusation of falsehood which Mr. Clinton, the trustee of the Town, while enjoying the privilege of addressing the Council, had made against him; and reminding them that the charge was that the statement made by the Mayor to the effect that Mr. Dennistoun had permission, when he was satisfied of Mr. Clinton's safety, to commence proceedings against Mr. Fowler, was false, the Mayor read the two letters following—remarking that if they believed Mr. Dennistoun to tell the truth they must convict Mr. Clinton of being an infamous liar. The letters are as follows:—

Peterboro', March 1, 1860.

Robert Dennistoun, Esq.

MY DEAR SIR:—Mr. Clinton, Trustee of the Town, having denied before the Council that he had authorized the using of his name in the suit brought against Mr. Fowler, I beg to be informed upon what authority you have issued the writ.

Yours truly,
(Signed) A. SAWERS,
Mayor.

(Copy.)
Peterboro', March 1, 1860.

Augustus Sawers, Esq., Mayor.

MY DEAR SIR:—In reply to your note asking me upon what authority I issued a writ in the suit against Mr. Fowler in the name of the Trustee of the Town, as I was instructed—I am responsible for using Mr. Clinton's name, having understood him to give me full authority to do so, on being satisfied that he was sufficiently indemnified from costs—being satisfied of this, I applied to David Smart for his authority as a co-trustee with Mr. Clinton, and received a reply that until he was furnished with proper security he would not allow his name to be used, which I communicated to you.—And after some delay, you informed me that Mr. Smart had resigned his Trusteeship, and Mr. Quinlan been appointed, and that I had Mr. Quinlan's authority to use his name in the suit your note refers to.

Yours truly,
(Signed) ROBT. DENNISTOUN.

DEAR SIR,—Would you oblige me by answering the following queries:

When I submitted the case for the town against Mr. Fowler, did I say that I would only allow my name to be used in the suit, and that I would do nothing whereby I could sustain individual loss?

Did I, in view of the difficulty of my position, speak of resigning the trust?

Did you say that you would consider the matter and advise me again?

Did you before issuing the writ, advise me that I was indemnified, and when did you first inform me that you were satisfied with the indemnity, and what is the nature of it?

If an appearance should not be filed against Mr. Fowler's writ, could he enter up judment, or if an not should he obtained otherwise, against whom would it be recorded?

P. S.—Could we go on with the suit without the consent of the Trustee for Port Hope.

Yours truly,

MY DEAR SIR,—I am in receipt of your letter of this date as to the suit against John Fowler, in which I am acting for the Town Council of Peterborough, and have used your name as a Trustee. And to which I assume that you never objected to allowing your name to be used when indemnified from costs. You did speak of resigning when I pointed out to you your position, as you thought. As considered it better not to do so, and nothing to embarrass the matter by any such step. I certainly am under the impression that during the month of January we had more than one interview on the subject. And I am quite certain that before the 30th January I understood that I was at liberty to go on with the suit, when I considered that you were in a position to recover from the Town any costs you might have to pay. Being satisfied that you were and had an hesitation in using use of your name, and without consent, proceeding with the suit, I did not think you must sign as the last letter, in regard to the matter.

The enormous hatred against poor Sir John Fowler has nothing to do with the other suits, and if not opposed on judgments will be opposed up by default against poor unfortunate.

In reply to the enclosed, to your letter, the Trustees for Port Hope can be consulted as often as may be necessary, to be used on being indemnified for costs.

Yours truly,
(Signed) ROBT. DENNISTOUN.

Mr. Morrow, Mr. Toole, and Mr. Walton still persisting in discussing a question which the Chairman, on adjournment to next meeting night of Tuesday, was moved and seconded by Mr. Ormond, and Mr. Walton moved in amendment, seconded by Mr. Ormond,—That the petition be referred to the Licenses Inspector.—Lost.

The first amendment was carried.

Mr. Toole moved, seconded by Mr. Ryan,—That Messrs. Walton, Chamberlain and McDougall be a Committee to fix the Mayor's salary for this year, and to report to the Council at its next meeting.

Mr. Chamberlain moved in amendment, seconded by Mr. Ryan,—That the members of the whole Council be the Committee to recommend the amount of salary to be paid the Mayor during the present year.

Mr. Maloney moved, seconded by Mr. Whyte,—That the Mayor's salary be the same as last year.—Lost.

The first amendment was carried.

Mr. O'Beirne moved, seconded by Mr. Walton,—That the detailed statement of the financial affairs of the past year which the auditors of the Town are in that behalf required to prepare shall set forth in full detail the receipts and expenditures with names, dates and particulars attached to each item, also the standing assets and liabilities of the Town in detail, with names, dates and particulars aforesaid.—Carried.

The Mayor said that he was now in a condition to refute the accusation of falsehood which Mr. Clinton, the trustee of the Town, while enjoying the privilege of addressing the Council, had made against him; and reminding them that the charge was that the statement made by the Mayor to the effect that Mr. Dennistoun had permission, when he was satisfied of Mr. Clinton's safety, to commence proceedings against Mr. Fowler, was false, the Mayor read the two letters following—remarking that if they believed Mr. Dennistoun to tell the truth they must convict Mr. Clinton of being an infamous liar. The letters are as follows:—

MY DEAR SIR:—In reply to your note asking me upon what authority I issued a writ in the suit against Mr. Fowler in the name of the Trustee of the Town, as I was instructed—I am responsible for using Mr. Clinton's name, having understood him to give me full authority to do so, on being satisfied that he was sufficiently indemnified from costs—being satisfied of this, I applied to David Smart for his authority as a co-trustee with Mr. Clinton, and received a reply that until he was furnished with proper security he would not allow his name to be used, which I communicated to you.—And after some delay, you informed me that Mr. Smart had resigned his Trusteeship, and Mr. Quinlan been appointed, and that I had Mr. Quinlan's authority to use his name in the suit your note refers to.

COMMUNICATIONS.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

DEAR SIR:—Your report of the proceedings of the Town Council in last week's Examiner is (unintentionally no doubt) incorrect in so far as they refer to myself.

1. I did not ask leave to be heard before the Council, and indeed only offered explanations after being urged thereto by members.

2. When the Clerk read over the resolution of the Council, I did reply to this effect: that the resolution so far as it went was quite satisfactory, but that it had never been carried out, inasmuch as the indemnity therein ordered to be given, had not been given—that in fact the intention of the resolution had never been carried out.

3. I did not state, in my second explanation, that the assertion of the Mayor, that I had given every authority to Mr. Dennistoun to proceed in my name was "false." To that assertion I simply replied that it was incorrect.

The term false was used by me in reply to an assertion by the Mayor, of which you take no notice, that I had all along, and was then, throwing every obstacle in the way of the recovery by the Town of the debt due by Mr. Fowler. That assertion I pronounced then, and I pronounce now to be false.

I have from the first given every assistance necessary on my part to recover the debt. I have never for a moment hesitated to allow my name to be used. I have simply asked for indemnity from personal liabilities and that request the Council considered reasonable, seeing that they at once instructed their Head to comply with it.

With reference to the matter primarily in dispute, so far as my memory serves me the understanding between Mr. Dennistoun and myself according to my impression of it at the time was, that while quite willing that my name should be used, I wished to be protected from personal responsibility, and that indemnity necessary to secure some immunity from that responsibility would be submitted to me before costs would be incurred. Mr. Dennistoun appears to have understood the matter differently. The disagreement was one liable to occur at any time and involves no question of truth or falsehood upon either side. I repeat the assertion which I denied so emphatically, and perhaps, under the circumstances, too strongly, was that I was inimical to the prosecution of the suit, and was throwing obstacles in the way of its prosecution. To that assertion I then applied, and do now apply the term "false." I might remark in conclusion, that I was not aware until after the meeting of the Council, that Mr. Dennistoun had ever considered the question of indemnity at all, or that he had considered the resolution of the Council as in itself sufficient for all purposes of protection to the Trustees.

Yours truly,
W. CLUXTON.

WHAT SHALL BE DONE?

To the Editor of the Examiner.

SIR,—A short time ago, two very melancholy cases of death occurred in this vicinity, resulting directly from the intemperate use of intoxicating liquors. What adds poignancy to the grief felt at their removal is the fact, that both have left a widow and children to deplore their untimely end.

So far from wishing to open afresh the wounds not yet healed in the hearts of the unhappy sufferers, I would do anything in my power to assist in binding up the broken hearted, and to soothe the dejected and forlorn. The vacancy then ruthlessly made can never be filled. The natural head and supporter of each family has been swept away. How? or by whom? is the enquiry. A Coroner's Jury in the one case, has, I understand, rendered a verdict of "death from the effects of intoxication and exposure." In the other case, precisely the same cause produced the same effects. Both the men met their deaths by indulging too freely in intoxicating liquors. This is the fact I wish to place before your readers,—and I revert to the occurrences because that you, Mr. Editor, and the Review, when recording the deaths, seemed to me not to note on the press should do, the cause of their deplorable end. Not that any good or evil can result thereby to the departed, but that the living, and those especially addicted to the habit of using spirituous liquors, may learn from their end fate, the dangers ever and they are travelling, and avoid a practice, injurious at best, disreputable and fearfully hazardous. An industrious generous artizan, goes to a horse race, imbibes freely of intoxicating drinks, at night tries to go home, pursues an opposite road, has reason from the effect of those drinks is dethroned, he travels on, turns aside, tumbles down in the snow, falls asleep, and sleeps the sleep of death. All brought on by his own voluntary act—inflicting irreparable loss to himself, and those he is bound by the laws of God and man to support. The other, an industrious farmer, whose indefatigable labour and economy had placed him in comparatively independent circumstances, but unfortunately, he too, had acquired by long practice, a love for spirituous liquors. The appetite once formed became imperious in its demands, and though the end came of the former victim was fresh and a warning voice was addressed to him, to beware of it on and on and on, and a fate expressed that such a fate would yet befall him, he heeds it not. "Give, give," is the cry of the insatiable tyrant within, he drinks and drinks, and at night gets his horse to go home—leaves his buffalo robe behind him, and drives 7 miles towards home—stops at a groggery for two or three hours, then gets his horse to go home, brings it to the door, and goes in again to enquire about his buffalo—drives upon its being in the house, that the boys have hid it, and such like—goes out again, finds the horse gone, starts to go home, but so stupid with the body and soul destroying liquor that he turns the opposite way—goes down to the lake, and when there turns up the robe in place of down—snuggles in a dreadfully stormy night for two or three miles up the lake, appears to have fallen or lied down repeatedly, and rises and walked on again till his fatality sent to rise no more. How many are there at this moment equally intoxicated with the unhappy man whose end we deplore. Though their fate is held up as a beacon to warn them—yet alas they heed it not—they keep on their dangerous course. The temptation arises amongst the temptations, what shall be done to stay the fearful evil. "Stop the cause of it" cries one, "put down taverns and groggeries" "pass an Maine Law," cries another, "society must protect itself, and are even laws passed to murder the rum and sin of intoxicating liquors, a crime and punishable accordingly."

All Maine Law, as well as all peasant, goes to confirm the theory of political economists that the supply of any article will be always regulated by the demand. The evil we complain of has a root, and legislation cannot reach it out. It may lop off its branches but not strike deeply, I fear to kill at all.

The demand may be lessened, by the exertion of the moral influences of temperance societies containing a constituent, contrary to the injurious, baneful and dangerous effects of using intoxicating liquors. Respectable and influential members of society can do a great deal by their countenancing total abstinence.

Hosts of families can recount sanatory influences on the family circle. Young men and especially young women can assist in banishing from the country a demand for articles, intoxicated dangerous. If the high time that something be done to stop that fearful tide, that now so fearfully threatens to overwhelm and destroy our beloved country. Twenty five or thirty years ago, its fearful inroads had the friends of humanity and of their country to rise up and stop its progress. They had a mind to work, and they succeeded in rolling back the wave of intemperance, to the astonishment of the world. They had no recourse then, to legislative enactments; they applied and used the only lawful instrument, and its effects were astonishing.

At this moment when all the interests of the country are in a prosperous state, the efforts of the friends of temperance have relaxed, or are partly diverted in another channel. Many of these have supposed that "moral suasion" which at first means powerful and successful to put down intemperance, has done its work, that "legal measures" in what is required now, and they spend their efforts in trying, to obtain a prohibitory liquor law. That something must be done, and done speedily we all admit. I advise that we individually set to work and use our tongue to persuade men to give up using intoxicating liquors—let our precept be backed by an unblemished conduct.—Let us collectively address the public and urge our principles for their acceptance—let us by all means in our power try to keep people from using these liquors, the demand being the supply will cease, and the Maine Law will then come without our asking for it.

I am,
Mr. Editor,
yours,
A TEETOTALER.

TREATMENT GIVEN TO REFORMERS &c., BY THE INTERESTED AMONG MANKIND.

Mr. Editor,—One great obstruction to human progress has ever been the stigma of utopianism fastened on Reformers &c., by the envious, the stupid, and interested among mankind. Men of genius, and men who had at heart the good of humanity, have been comparatively few as regards mankind, when set off against the whole of the multitude. Like stars they have studded our mental universe of surrounding darkness; for a time they have been gazed at with wonder, and envy, ending with attempts to obscure them by ridicule, obloquy imprisonment; and even to extinguish and blot them out by the hand of violence and death. At the head of this persecution have generally been arrayed the civil powers, in combination with a state church. I do not confine this remark to Canada; but whenever, and wherever rulers and state priests have been flattering on the ignorance and superstition of a people, they have risen up like furies to put down and persecute Reformers, social, religious and political.

That which is called a "Government" is a creature of social necessity, and brought into existence by the wants of humanity.—A single hand is too feeble of itself to protect life, property and liberty; hence the power of association must be called in, to effect these objects. Rules must be made to define what are rights; and penal matters to enforce these rights must be prescribed. These rules are called the laws of the land; and the power that modifies and administers them is called the civil Government. The foundation of all these is, (or should be) the will of the people. But the rulers first delegated by the people as their agents, taking advantage of their position, and of the indolence of the people to look after them (the rulers) have by usurpation extended and perpetuated their power; and by the aid of that hocus pocus called a state church have cheated the people out of their just rights, in making their own laws for their own governments. In the early history of Britain, the first enemy to be encountered by the people was a despotic monarchy. The ruler was omnipotent, and the people were slaves. Then succeeded the tyranny of the state church. Every one who has read the Story Worthies, or Neils History of the Puritans, knows well that its treatment of the English Puritans, and the Scottish Covenanters was savage in the extreme, verifying to the letter the scripture saying, "that the tender mercies of the wicked are cruel." At a later period the aristocracy was in the ascendant and history tells us how they did. And oh! in that struggle for freedom, and the rights of man, how many martyrs to liberty or religious truth have waded through seas of blood, and sealed their testimony at the stake, or on the block. Hampden, Sidney, Wilkes, Rust, Cobbett, Hume, and hosts of others, could testify (were they still living,) that nothing was left to them by their persecutors, making life desirable.—Reproach and contumely, withering scorn, state prosecutions, and imprisonments, followed the most favoured of these men, while the gallows was reserved for the rest.

ARRIVAL OF THE "AFRICA."

A REFORM BILL PROMISED.

AMERICAN COASTING TRADE.

Savoy not to be Ceded to France!

New York, March 4.

The steamship Africa arrived this morning with Liverpool dates of 18th ult. She reports the steamships Nova Scotian, Teutonic and Circassian to have arrived out on the 16th, and the Fulton on the 17th.

London, Feb. 17. The money market is easier, and the funds improving. Canada advanced to 94¼ a 94¾ for money. The bullion in the Bank of England had increased £28,000 since last weekly report. American securities are more active.

COMMERCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

Liverpool Markets.—Breadstuffs are quiet. Flour nominally unchanged, but difficult to sell—quoted at 22s a 22s 6d.—Wheat inactive and unchanged. Corn dull and easier; yellow, 32s a 33s 6d. Beef in good request. Pork selling freely at 75s a 80s. New lard in fair demand, 56s a 60s. Ashes active and dearer, say 29s 6d a 30s for pots; 34s a 35s for pearls.—London corn market firmer.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The attention of all classes is concentrated on the Budget, and meetings pro and con are held in all directions. The conservatives show an increasing hostility to both the Budget and the commercial treaty with France, and in the House of Lords an explanation had been called for of the article which bids England not to prohibit the exportation of coal.

Lord John Russell stated in Parliament that the special mission of Lord Elgin to China had not been definitely arranged. Lord John Russell announced that he would introduce the Reform Bill on the first of March. He also stated that the correspondence was progressing with the Government of the United States with respect to the five admission of British shipping to the American coasting trade between the Eastern States and California, &c., but the matter was not in a position to be laid before the House.

In response to Mr. Peel, Lord J. Russell said that enquiries had been addressed to Sardinia, as to whether it was the intention to cede Savoy to France. Sardinia denied any such intention.

The Earl of Granville also announced in the House of Lords, that France will do nothing touching that annexation without first consulting the great Powers, and obtaining the consent of the inhabitants.

A motion in the House to abolish flogging in the navy was negatived.

The army estimates show an increase of two millions sterling.

It is denied that Austria has replied to propositions to England touching the Italian question. It is also reported that Russia rejects the proposition.

Advices from Madrid state that Marsha O'Donnel is actively engaged in reconnoitering the country and surrounding Tetuan. He had received a delegation from the Moorish government, asking on what terms peace would be granted. The public spirit in Spain however is warlike, and it is believed that war will continue.

The iron-masters of Glasgow have agreed to keep their furnaces out for another fortnight.

Dr. Murray, Bishop of Rochester is dead.

The land forces of England are fixed at 146,000 men, being an increase of nearly 6,500. The East Indian army numbers 22,000.

The new Whitworth gun has been tried with astounding success, surpassing in range and accuracy the Armstrong.

FRANCE.

It is stated that the French Government has entered into relations with Prussia as a member of the Zollverein, with the view of negotiating a commercial treaty similar to that with England.

M. Thouvenel's circular to the French diplomatic agents, in response to the Encyclical letter of the Pope, is published, and is attracting attention. It apparently convicts the Pope of improperly using his spiritual office for political purposes. The despatch of M. Thouvenal to the French Ambassador at Rome is also published, explaining the present state of affairs in the Legations, and the reasons for the same.

The decree in the Moniteur of this day, postponing the meeting of the French Chambers from the 23rd inst., as originally decided, to the 1st of March, is supposed to have reference to the debates in Parliament, for by that time the fate of the Budget, of the Commercial Treaty with France and perhaps of Lord Palmerston's Cabinet, will be known.

Marshal Niel has been called up from Toulouse to Paris by telegraph.

Private accounts from Naples state that a conspiracy has been discovered among a portion of the Neapolitan army, and on the same authority it is affirmed that the plot has been traced to the agency of Piedmontese emissaries. It also appears that a note is to be transmitted, if it has not been so already, to the Powers, complaining of these attempts to excite disaffection. In the same manner a plot has been discovered to the exciters of mutiny in the Swiss regiments some time since in the service of Naples.

The Pope has addressed the following letter to the Bishop of Orleans, dated the 14th of January:—

"Venerable Brother, health and apostolic benediction. In this great trouble of Italy, which has violently overthrown Sovereigns and ruined throughout the Æmilia and the Romagna the legitimate authority of the Holy See, but which the contrivers and promoters of the rebellion desire,—their last triumph, in which has been fully declared by that work, full of deception, which has been published in France, and has been circulated not only in the cities, but also in all the hamlets of Italy. EARLY VEGETABLES.

Many farmers are deterred from attempting to produce very early vegetables, by an erroneous idea, that the making of a hot-bed is a complicated and difficult operation, while it is just as simple as making a bill of corn. Every man who has a garden of whatever size, if he will once try the experiment of making a hot-bed, will, we venture to predict, feel amply repaid for his trouble. It may not be entirely satisfactory, but he will never forget the lesson afterwards. All that is necessary is to dig a pit about 18 inches deep, with the top level or sloping a little to the south, then set a rough frame made of four boards nailed together at the corners upon the bed of manure fill the frame with six inches of garden soil and cover with a window of glass. Any old window will answer the purpose, but it is better to have the bars of the sash run only one way, and to have the glass laid in the manner of shingles.

The best plants to throw any tomatoes and cabbages which may be transplanted from the hot-bed to the open ground without any trouble. We have removed tomatoes when they were in blossom, and had them all live. If melons or cucumbers are forced, they should be planted in flowerpots, that in transplanting, these may be put over upon your open hand and give it a gentle thump, when the earth comes out in a solid lump and the roots are not disturbed in the least. While the plants are growing, they should be watered frequently, and in cold days the sash should be covered with mats to give the plants air. We have found the growing of the plants under glass, from a cold hot-bed, 3 feet by 6, and to a large grapery for raising the black Hamburgh and Frontignac grapes, the most satisfactory of all horticultural operations. Having the plants in the ground both in heat and moisture, the plants can be made to grow with a vigor which they rarely if ever exhibit in the open air. A hot-bed should be made from four to six weeks before the time for planting corn.

ACTION OF FROST UPON SOILS.

The soluble part of the soil is the inorganic food of the plants. Rain water cannot come in contact with the soil, or even with a gravel heap without dissolving some of it. Expose almost any stone, or handful of gravel, washed clean, to the action of a quart or so of rain water several days and upon evaporating the water, it will be seen from the residue left that a portion has been dissolved. Now let these same stones be exposed, covered or partly covered with water, and compare, to the action of frost, setting them out of doors, for two or three cold nights, taking care that they thaw by day. Pour off the water, rinsing with fresh and evaporate as above, and it will be seen that a very much larger quantity has come into solution. The reason is, that stones being somewhat porous, by the action of the frost their outer portion is broken up, scaled and fissured, and a vastly greater surface is exposed to the action of the water, even though this freezing is not visible to the eye. While hard & polished substances freezing and thawing, the same effect must take place.

CHARCOAL.

Charcoal surpasses all other substances in the power which it possesses of condensing ammonia within its pores, particularly when it has been previously heated to redness. It absorbs ninety times its volume of ammoniacal gas, which may be again separated by moistening it with water. It is by the virtue of this power that the roots of plants are supplied with charcoal exactly as in manure, with an atmosphere of carbonic acid and air, which is renewed as quickly as it is abstracted. Charcoal has a physical as well as a chemical effect on soils, which is decidedly useful. It renders them, as far as it is present, light and friable, and gives additional warmth to them by its color, and retains readily the rays of the sun during the day. Wherever charcoal has been applied, rust never affects the growth of wheat. —Liebig.

☞ The hay crop of Maine averages 1,000,000 tons, worth $10,000,000 per annum, and the amount of pasturage is as much more. Grass is and always must be the staple crop of Maine. Our long winters do it good, and not harm.—Maine Farmer.

PHONOGRAPHY,
or
WRITING BY SOUND!!

PHONOGRAPHY was invented by ISAAC PITMAN, of Bath, England, in the year 1837. It is the most simple, most natural, most rapid, and most easily learned system of writing which has ever been, or ever can be invented.

During the past fifteen years, hundreds of thousands of persons, in England and America, in both public and private life, have learned to write Phonography, and thousands of social and business letters annually pass through the post office.

Nor is the great popularity to be wondered at. The present system of writing is exceedingly cumbersome, and totally unworthy these days of progress and invention. Phonography is equally as legible, can be learned in one twentieth the time, and can be written six times as fast! In other words, the labor of six days can be performed in one—one man can do the work of six. So simple is the system, too, that a person may learn to write it slowly, in a couple of hours. An hour's daily practice for a few weeks will enable any person to write Phonography with certainty, and with some degree of freedom. The same amount of practice continued for six months will enable a person to take reports of speeches lectures, sermons, or conversation, and to read them with accuracy.

The late Hon. Thos. H. Benton, upon being presented with a verbatim report of one of his masterly speeches, taken by a little boy only twelve years of age, said: "Had this art been known 40 years ago it would have saved me 20 years hard labor." The learned senator spoke but a portion of the truth. What long-hand requires six years to accomplish, Phonography will perform in one.

To clergymen, Editors, Physicians, Lawyers, Secretaries, Conveyancers, Law and Medical Students, Lecturers, Printers, School Teachers, Merchants, School Boys and Girls, a knowledge of Phonography is of vast utility. In fact there is no profession or calling in which it is not useful, and no young man's education can be considered complete without it.

During the past 9 months hundreds of persons in Canada, of every pursuit in life, have acquired the Art, from many of whom the subscriber has received neatly-written phonographic letters, expressive of their delight with the attainment, and the extraordinary ease with which they have acquired it.

For the purpose of aiding in the dissemination of so important a reform in his own country, the subscriber is now prepared to supply all who apply, with the MANUAL OF PHONOGRAPHY, and the PHONOGRAPHIC COPY BOOK, sent by mail to any part of the Province, postage pre-paid, for the small sum of ☞ ONE DOLLAR.

Anybody and everybody, who can learn anything, can learn PHONOGRAPHY from the MANUAL without other assistance. Those who wish to be able to put their thoughts to paper at the rate of from 100 to 250 words per minute, should send for the above-mentioned works at once. The instruction given by the Manual is as plain as A. B. C., and ten times as easy to understand.

STARTLING BUT TRUE!
SURVIVE OR PERISH.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.

The history of this great remedy is the most wonderful medical revelation that the world has ever known. It is not a history written by one man, or even derived from the experience of one nation, but consists of a compilation of testimonials from the sick of every country—a record, the like of which has never been adduced in favour of any discovery or invention since time began.

BILIOUS DISORDERS.

In whatever form disease attacks the liver, it is repelled and exterminated by this searching, painless and irresistible corrective.

Let the sick whom the faculty have abandoned resort with confidence to this antibilious agent, and a restoration to health and activity will be the unvarying result.

DYSPEPSIA.

The great scourge of this continent yields quickly to a course of these antiseptic Pills and the digestive organs are restored to their proper tone; no matter in what hideous shape this hydra of disease exhibits itself, this searching and unerring remedy dispenses it from the patient's system.

GENERAL DEBILITY AND WEAKNESS.

From whatever cause, LOWNESS OF SPIRITS, and all other signs of a diseased liver, and other disorganization of the system, vanish under the ameliorating influence of this all powerful antiseptic and detergent remedy.

SICKLY FEMALES

Should lose no time in trying a few doses of this regulating and purifying remedy; whatever may be their complaint, it can be taken with safety in all periodical and other disorganizations; its effect is all but miraculous.

Holloway's Pills are the best remedy known in the world for the following diseases:

Asthma,	Headaches,
Bowel Complaints,	Indigestion,
Coughs,	Influenza,
Colds,	Inflammation,
Chest Diseases,	Inward Weakness
Costiveness,	Liver Complaints,
Dyspepsia,	Lowness of Spirits,
Diarrhœa,	Piles.
Dropsy,	Stone and Gravel,
Debility,	Secondary Symptoms,
Fever and Ague,	Venereal Affections.
Female Complaints,	Worms of all kinds.

☞ CAUTION!—None are genuine unless the words "Holloway, New York and London," are discernible as a Water-mark in every leaf of the book of directions around each pot or box; the same may be plainly seen by holding the leaf to the light. A handsome reward will be given to any one rendering such information as may lead to the detection of any party or parties counterfeiting the medicines or vending the same, knowing them to be spurious.

. Sold at the Manufactory of Professor HOLLOWAY, 80 Maiden Lane, New York, and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicine throughout the United States and the civilized world, in pots at 25 cents, 63 cents, and $1 each.

☞ There is considerable saving by taking the larger sizes.

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.

CONSOLATION FOR THE SUFFERING.

Nearly fifty years continual use in every part of the habitable globe, amongst the savage and the civilized alike, has proved that simple erruptions, open sores, hard tumors, scrofulous developments of all kinds, abscesses, cancers, old wounds, and, in one word, every species of inflammation and suppuration, whether in the skin, the flesh, the glands, or among the muscles, can be arrested and permanently cured, without danger, by rubbing in and using as a dressing, this inestimable Ointment.

SCROFULA, ERYSIPLAS, AND SALT RHEUM, ERUPTIONS OF THE SKIN, PILES, AND FESTULA,

No remedy has ever done so much for the cure of diseases of the Skin, whatever form they may assume, as this Ointment. No case of Salt Rheum, Scurvy, Sore Heads, Scrofula or Erysipelas, can long withstand its influence.

BAD LEGS, OLD SORES, ULCERS, &c.

Cases of many years standing that have pertinaciously refused to yield to any other remedy or treatment, have invariably succumbed to a few applications of this powerful ungwent.

Arising from a bad state of the blood or chronic disease, are eradicated, and a clear and transparent surface regained by the restorative action of this Ointment. It surpasses many of the cosmetics and other toilet appliances in its power to dispel snakes and other disfigurements of the face.

Every form and feature of these prevalent and stubborn disorders is eradicated locally and entirely by the use of this emollient; warm fomentations should precede its application. Its healthy qualities will be found to be thorough and invariable.

Both the Ointment and Pills will be used in the following cases:

Bunions,	Skin Diseases,
Burns,	Swelled Glands,
Chapped Hands,	Sore Legs,
Chilblains,	Sore Breasts,
Fistula,	Sore Heads
Gout,	Sore Throats,
Lumbago,	Sores of all kinds,
Mercurial Eruptions,	Spraines,
Piles,	Stiff Joints,
Rheumatism,	Tetter,
Ringworm,	Ulcers,
Salt Rheum,	Venereal Sores,
Scalds,	Wounds of all kinds.

☞ CAUTION!—None are genuine unless the words "Holloway, New York and London" are discernible as a Water-mark in every leaf of the book of directions around each pot or box; the same may be plainly seen by holding the leaf to the light. A handsome reward will be given to any one rendering such information as may lead to the detection of any party or parties counterfeiting or vending the same, knowing them to be spurious.

. Sold at the manufactory of Professor HOLLOWAY, 80 Maiden Lane, New York, and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicine throughout the United States and the civilized world, in pots at 25 cents, 63 cents, and $1 each.

☞ There is a considerable saving by taking the larger sizes.

N. B.—Directions for the guidance of patients in every disorder are affixed to each pot.

IS pleasantly situated at the head of ST. PAUL STREET, amongst the largest wholesale houses in the city. It has (with business men generally, and especially with the best Merchants of both Provinces) become so great a favorite, that it is now acknowledged to be THE Business Hotel of Montreal. To meet the extensive increase, during the last year in the business of the house, the proprietor has built a large addition. The Dining Room has been extended and made more commodious; there have been completed in the new wing, a great number of well-ventilated sleeping rooms, and the House throughout has been refitted, and now contains many improvements and conveniences hitherto unknown to its guests. The whole of the beds have, at a great expence, been furnished with NEW SPRING MATTRASSES. The Proprietor expects that by continuing his personal management of the concern, THE ALBION is to my the least of it, will continue to be, as it now is, the best Dollar and a half Hotel in Canada.

THE PRINCE OF WALES IS COMING.

The Prince of Wales is coming, from his sea-girt home to see,
How Victoria's loyal children in Canada agree,
He's coming, we'll receive him with an open heart and hand,
And give him a hearty welcome to this our promised land,
Yes, we'll give him welcome worthy of his loved and loyal race,
Who in our hearts as Britons hold a warm and honor'd place;
Be ready, then, all ready, when he lands upon our shore,
To show that we are worthy of our patriot sires of yore!

He'll use no other banner than the old flag of the brave,
The banner that ne'er floated o'er tyrant or o'er slave!
He'll need no introduction but the wagre of his name,
No other commendation than his fame!
The shadow of his mother will rest upon his brow,
The Royal stamp of Brunswick's line is on it even now.
A talisman to guard him wherever he may roam
Where children of the Empire later have found a distant home.

Then let old Scotia's thistle with England's rose entwine,
The Maple Leaf of Canada with Erin's shamrock join
To form a garland worthy of the brow of Britain's son,
Who's manly independant stamp the Nation's love has won.
Let Canada prove worthy of the laurels she has gained,
That loyalty through good and ill which she has still retained;
And high above the loudest cheers that o'er her forests green,
Is heard, may ring and echo back again, GOD SAVE THE QUEEN.

LOOK BEFORE YOU LEAP.

"My son," said an aged father to his promising boy, as he discovered his increasing interest in the daughter of his neighbor, "weigh well this matter. I am an old man, and have not been an idle observer of the human family during my long life. One misstep taken now may ruin your prospect of happiness for life, or so mar it as to render life almost undesirable. Many young men have made shipwreck of their peace by unadvisedly and unjudiciously contracting an alliance of matrimony with women of bad dispositions."

"Why, father," interrupted Charles, "you are putting me quite aback, by speculating in so serious a manner upon what I thought so agreeable a subject, as to excite my apprehensions and awake my fears. I have not designedly kept anything secret from you: my visits to neighbor B.'s have all been known, and never yet disapproved of, to my knowledge."

"No, my son, you have not acted covertly or unfilially in this matter. This gives me increasing confidence in you. I have noticed, and with pain, too, your oft repeated visits to Mr. B.'s, and have as often desired to caution you, but have been waiting for a suitable opportunity. The best evidence, I think, a father can give to a son, of his love, and his confidence in him, is the plainness and candor with which he makes known to him his mind upon all subjects.—To be honest, then, you must allow me to say that you are mistaken in Miss B——'s worthiness of your affections. She is not the young lady your imagination has painted, I am sure you would not, upon this or any other subject, set in direct opposition to sentiments you have habitually expressed."

"Why, father," exclaimed Charles, "you seem more and more serious."

"Have I not, my son, again and again heard you say, that you would not marry any young lady who was "unkind to her mother," or who was disrespectful to her."

"Yes, father, those are my sentiments, and always will be; but I was not aware that there could be any application to them in the present case. Miss B. has always appeared exceedingly mild and pleasant when in my company, and always treated her mother, for aught I knew, with propriety."

"Ah, my son, your affection has thrown a mantle over her conduct. She has wounded her mother's feelings in the presence of us all. Old people look at these things dispassionately. Your mother, and myself, have often spoken, when alone, of Miss B.'s unkind treatment of her mother. We have seen her give her mother glances with her eyes, and make such tart answers, when she was not suited, as to cause our hearts to bleed. Miss B. has too much sense, and values too much her esteem, to come right out before us, and tell her mother to hold her tongue, or that she does not know what she is talking about, and such like. But her good natural sense had not power enough over her bad natural disposition to suppress those glances, those intonations of voice, and those short answers, which her too sensitive mother understood."

"But, father, Mary has much to contend with. Her mother, you know, is not the most intelligent woman in the world; and this sometimes is very mortifying to her daughter. Mary, having been sent abroad, and becoming educated in a very superior manner, finds it sometimes a difficult task to put up with her mother's lack of modern improvements."

"That argument, Charles," rejoined the father, "if of any weight, goes directly against Miss B., because she should be the more tender and forbearing, kind and respectful to her mother, so as to hide, if possible, her imperfections. It is a hard case, my son, that a daughter, because she has had superior advantages, and become more accomplished than her mother, should set herself above her. In those very advantages and accomplishments should be laid the basis of heart-felt gratitude, respect and affection. What! treat her own mother with unkindness and neglect in company, especially before those in whose eyes she should endeavor to exalt herself! Who was it Charles, that watched over Mary from her earliest infancy—bore with the foolishness and troublesomeness of her early childhood? Who guarded her health, watched over her by day and by night, and often and again, with maternal tenderness and anxiety, listened whether she breathed in health? Who wept when Mary's skin was hot, her breath feverish, and her pulse quick? Who bathed her temples, prepared for her every little delicacy, and hung over her as an angel ministering to her wants? And last, though not least, who was it that bowed with Mary at the throne of grace, when her little lips could hardly articulate, and taught her to lisp the name of Jesus? Was it not her own mother? The same mother she now can treat with neglect and unkindness. Beware, my son! I have only a few more words to say. Miss B. is unquestionably a young lady of fine talents and superior education. She has a fine, commanding person. She is of a highly respectable, genteel family.—All these things are admirable. But she lacks one thing—she lacks an amiable disposition: she is "unkind to her mother;" and my experience has always taught me that an unkind daughter habitually makes an unkind wife."

HOW TO HAVE LIGHT.

We are responsible not only for what we do, but for what we see. More than we often think, the eyes of the soul are to our power. Say what we will of the obscurities of Revelation, and the mysteries of Providence, truly spiritual and believing men and women go on reading both, deeper and deeper, clearer and clearer, all their lives, till at last, no longer through a glass darkly—the veil taken away—they see as they are seen, know as they are known, stand face to face with the Savior they have so long and trustingly followed, and have "open vision of the written word." If we do not behold the constellation of splendid truths that radiate their evangelic light from the gospel, it is because blindness is in the dim pupils of our eyes, unused or abused. Just as fast as we will let it, the day will dawn and the day-stars arise in our hearts. By living out all the good we know, in the daily beauty of holiness, we shall behold life's grand proportions. By walking with Christ you shall wear his likeness. Nay—for He is a living Christ—you shall have him formed within you, not only the hope, but the present possession glory. And because you know him spiritually, in the purity and love of His life and cross, men will also take knowledge of you, that you have been with Him, are with Him now, and shall be his people forever.—Rev. Dr. F. D. Huntington.

MATTERS FOR WOMEN TO CONSIDER.

The Hearthstone Club of New York, which we have had occasion to mention several times, is evidently a sensible institution. It is a meeting of women who have households to superintend, or expect to have hereafter, to discuss all matters pertaining to the economies and comforts of home and the improvement of social life. Why should not women have their clubs as well as men; or better still, why should not the men and women club together in conversation upon matters of social interest and improvement? It would be infinitely more useful than the gossip of the familiar call or the more formal small talk of the party.

At a late meeting of the Hearthstone Club the subject of household furniture was touched upon and the general opinion of the women seemed to be that our houses are furnished too expensively and at the same time in shockingly bad taste. We agree with the New York women on this point. We run to showy furniture in this country to an extent that is considered gaudy almost to barbarism by people of good taste in other countries. We have gay carpets and bright hued upholstery, and then we shut out the air and sunlight to keep them from fading, and taboo "the best rooms" to the children, that the delicate colors may not get soiled or the fragile structures broken.

This bad taste prevails from the highest to the lowest ranks in society. The country girl whose wedding outfit amounts only to two or three hundred dollars, will devote half or two-thirds of the sum to the furniture of the parlor, to be opened only on rare and special occasions, and will be satisfied with inconvenient and shabby arrangements in the common rooms.—The whole comfort of domestic life, so far as it consists in the beauty and convenience of the house, is sacrificed to the adornment of "the best room." How much better to furnish the whole house neatly and with good taste, and to devote what is usually spent for gaudy ornaments to a few cheerful pictures for the walls; to occupy the pleasantest rooms, and to have the whole house so uniformly cheerful that guests may be allowed the liberty of the house, and feel at home in any part of it; to let in the quickening sunshine and in summer time the fresh air, laden with the fragrance of the vines that creep over the windows. More than half the families of New England, we suppose, live in dingy and melancholy back rooms, keeping in the pleasantest apartment in the house in a state of oppressed splendour for the reception of occasional callers, or an annual party. With those rooms the children have no home associations and rather dread to enter them than otherwise, lest they may damage or tarnish something. There is a great deal of traditional folly in our social life, after all our self-sufficient praise of the wisdom and refinement of the age we live in. The women should take up these matters, and give them a radical overhauling, with the view of getting the greatest amount of comfort and improvement out of our home life.—Springfield Republican.

Overture.—Meddled too frequently with opinions, and having taken them "for better or for worse," constitute it a point of honor to maintain them after, though Reason and Truth ask for a divorce.

Say nothing respecting yourself, either good, bad or indifferent; nothing good for that is vanity; nothing bad for that is affectation; nothing indifferent for that is silly.

HONESTY.

"Just Heaven forbid
That a man should ever count for gain
What villainy must earn. No! we are poor.
Be honesty our riches. The true heart is noble."

All true success in life must be based upon honest dealing with our fellow men. We all need friendship, love and sympathy. Life without these is misery indeed. A man in any neighborhood, known to be devoid of common honesty, is shunned as an enemy to his race and an outcast from respectable society.

Like a freebooter of the seas, he is a bane and a byword in every well-ordered community. Honest men look upon him as a putrescence on the body politic. His countenance betokens a downcast despicable wretch. The frowns of Heaven rest upon him, his doom is to suffer regret, remorse and shame.

Contrast such a man with the upright honest man. All the neighborhood loves and respects him, are his friends and sympathizers. The widow and orphan advise with and trust him. He is a model man to whom reference is made for imitation. He adorns and purifies wherever he is known, and leaves the world better than he found it.

Solomon, the wise, hath said, "The getting of treasures by a lying tongue is a vanity tossed to and fro, of them that seek death. A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches, and loving favor rather than silver and gold. Buy the truth and sell it not; also wisdom, instruction and understanding."

"Honor, thou sacred pledge, thou bond of faith,
Which none can forfeit with impunity.
By thee sustained, the lowly herdsman smiles
Amid his toils, and grateful thanks his God
For that he bears a conscience all untainted,
While the pride and pomp this world affords,
Cheers not the drooping heart to honor lost."

WANTED—A PRINTER.

We do not know the author of the following, but he or she has a big heart, a lively brain, and a good natured countenance:

"Wanted—a printer" says a contemporary. Wanted—a mechanical curiosity with brawn and fingers: a thing that will think and act, but still a machine: a being who undertakes the most systematic monotonous drudgery—yet one the ingenuity of man has never supplanted, mechanically, that's a printer.

A printer; yet for all his dissipated and reckless habits, a worker—at all times and hours by day and by night:—sitting up in close and unwholesome offices; when gay crowds are hurrying off to theatres: later still when street revelers are gone and the city sleeps; in the fresh air of the morning, in the broad and gushing sunlight, some printing machine is at its case, with its eternal, unvarying click! click!

Click! click! the mute polished cubes fall into the stick, the mute integers of expression are marshalled into line and march forth an immortal print. Click; and the latest intelligence becomes old, the thought a principle, the simple idea a living sentiment. Click! click! from grave to gay, item after item—a murderer, a bit of scandal, a grateful and glowing thought, are clothed by the mute and impassive fingers of the machine and sent adrift is the sea of thought. He must not think of home, of kindred, of wife or of babe. His work lies before him and thought is chained to his copy.

You know him by his works, who read the papers and are quick at typographical errors: whose eye may rest on this mute editors and authors, who scorn the simple medium of your fame, think not that the printer is altogether a machine. Think not that he is indifferent to the subject. Think not a subtle ray may not penetrate the recesses of his heart, or the flowers he gathers may not leave some of the fragrance on his toil-worn fingers. But when you seek a friend, companion, adviser—when you would elevate one who, from sympathy, may fitly represent either or both—when you want judges, governors and presidents, O, ye people, advertise: "Wanted—a printer."

An Eloquent Extract.—"Generation after generation," says a fine writer, "have felt as we now feel, and their lives were as active as our own. They passed like a vapor, while nature wore the same aspect of beauty as when her Creator commanded her to be. The Heavens shall be as bright over our graves as they now are around our paths. The world will have the same attractions for our offspring yet unborn, that she had ones for us as children. Yet a little while and all will have happened. The throbbing heart will be stilled, and we shall be at rest. Our funeral will wind its way, and prayers will be said, and then we shall be left alone in silence and darkness for the worms. And it may be for a short time we shall be spoken of, but the things of life will creep and our names will soon be forgotten. Days will continue to move on and laughter and song will be heard in the room in which we died; and the eye that mourned for us will be dried and glisten with joy; and even our children will cease to think of us, and will not remember to lisp our names."

Sowing Wild Oats.—In all the wide range of accepted British maxims there is none, take it all in all, more thoroughly abominable than this one as to the sowing of wild oats. Look at it as your side you will, and I will defy you to make anything but a devil's maxim of it. What a maxim—to be young old, or middle-age—sows that, and nothing else, shall he reap. The one only thing to do with wild oats is to put them carefully into the hottest part of the fire, and put them carefully burnt to dust every seed of them. If you sow them, no matter in what ground, up they will come, with long tough root, like couch-grass, and remorseful stalks and leaves, the more so there is one to heaven—a crop called "I wish such a heart could to think of." The devil, for whose special crop they are, will see that they thrive, and you, and nobody else will have to reap them; and no courage, energy or will get them out of the soil, which must lie long deep again and again. Wait for you, if with all your care, you can make the ground sweet again by your dying day. "Boys will be boys," is not much better, but that has a true side to it, but this encouragement to the sowing of wild oats is simply devilish, for it means that a young man is to give way to the temptations, and follow the lusts of his age. What are we to do with the wild oats of manhood and old age—with ambition, over-reaching, the false weights, hardness, suspicion, avarice—if the wild oats of youth are to be sown, and not burnt? What possible distinction can we draw between them? If we may sow the one, why not the other?—Tom Brown at Oxford.

A CHAPTER ON ONE OF "THE LOST."

From the London Free Press, March 9.

What a thrilling history of the "Lost by the Hungarian" might be written! What material for a series of sketches—the reality of which should read more strange than romance, more fantastic and improbable than the dreams of the novelist—might be weaved from the lives of the wrecked in this lost ship! Could we trace separately the history of each of the lost ones—from boyhood to youth, from youth to age (and perhaps old age in some) who miserably perished on the morning of February 20th—what a medley of hopes and fears, grief and joys, sunshine and sorrow, would be presented to the mind! Yet they are all gone,—never more to greet us in the flesh; they live only in the spirit.

The fate of one young lady, and her husband, is vividly impressed on the mind of the writer. She was one of those "maids of merry England," whom once to know is to remember, and the recollection was a pleasure. Sweet in disposition as Nature's child free from guile, and as innocent in heart as beautiful in person, she was the light of her home, the chief one in the circle of friends. A live of joy and virtuous happiness seemed in store for her. But, alas! she has gone; swallowed up by the relentless, storm-tossed waters, and her gentle spirit has quitted its earthly abode for a happier state.

Last year a Spanish gentleman, M. Marino, a Samaneigo, met in the metropolis of the world, the young lady whose case we dwell on. He had visited England for the purpose of perfecting his studies in the medical profession, intended to return and settle in the far South. His prepossessing appearance arrested the attention of the young lady, while her charms made an indelible impression on him. After a few months' courtship the attachment was consummated in marriage, and M. de Samaneigo prepared to return with his newly acquired bride, and well-earned diplomas, to his native land, Guayquil, South America. The usual preparations were made; the furniture was ordered from Paris, and it was intended that the happy pair should sail by one of the Cunard vessels in February. The following is a paragraph from a letter sent by the bride to a dear friend in this city:—

"I am preparing for my voyage; this is, indeed a fearful trial, but lessened in some degree by feeling that I am leaving my home, my friends, and my country with one who will do all in his power to soften my sorrows. We purpose leaving Liverpool in the Persia for New York, on the 26th, and we intend (D. v.) visiting the Falls of Niagara. Could you not manage to meet us there? . . . . . but I am sure you will arrange to come if you can."

But the delays incident to her preparations for the voyage, and the advent to her friends, prevented her leaving as arranged. A reply to the above was, as may be supposed, a cordial invitation; and 26th Jan., last, Madame wrote, explaining the cause of the delay, and naming the Hungarian as the vessel by which they intended to sail. The portion of the second letter runs thus:—

"We have been about the vessel to-day. I am so delighted to hear that you will be able to meet us at the Falls. I cannot tell you how glad I shall be to see you.—But oh! ——— I am sure the meeting will be a sad one, as I feel sure you will be the last of all my friend I shall ever see for years! I dare not think of parting from mamma, but should it please God to spare us all, I hope to return to her in a few years."

How little she knew her fate when penning the above lines! The meeting that she presaged would be "sad," never came and the return "to mamma" must never be! Again, from the same letter:—

"We purpose (D. v.) leaving Liverpool for Portland on Wednesday, the 8th of February, in the Hungarian, and direct on by rail to the Falls . . . I long for you to see my husband—he is most devoted and affectionate, and I look forward to a happy future."

Three weeks after the above was written the Hungarian was wrecked! The news came—a severe blow to her friends here, who anticipated a joyous meeting with her tried companion of early youth. Anxiously was the telegraphic wires watched day by day. Hope alternated with fear—she might not be on board! They possibly may have missed the ship. Vain surmise; the names appeared among the fatal list of the passengers booked by the Grand Trunk agents in Liverpool. They are gone with the rest, beyond a doubt, and the hope of the "happy future," so fondly cultivated in, and its quietus on the frightful night when the Hungarian went down. Her friends in England know; our file, of the date of the newly-wedded pair, and the already widowed mother has sought to do but to mourn for her only child.

Original Sin.—A young gentleman being asked to write some lines in a young lady's album, perpetrated the following:

"Something original you ask me to write,
I hardly know where to begin;
I fear there is nothing original in me
Except original sin."

The fellow who picked up a living has become very round-shouldered.

A SINGULAR STORY.

A remarkable story is current in Pittsburgh and other parts of western Pennsylvania. It possesses the elements of the wildest romance, but it is religiously believed by very many persons. We give it as it was told to us, without, of course, endorsing the occurrence as actual facts.

About two weeks ago, in the village of Latrobe, in Western Pennsylvania, a solemn mass was observed in the Roman Catholic Church, for the repose of the soul of a deceased priest. A number of worshippers were in the church at the time. Just as the officiating priest was about to perform the most solemn part of the rites, his purpose was checked by an astonishing appearance. The form of the deceased priest himself appeared in front of the altar, with hand uplifted in a warning manner. The officiating clergyman stepped back, when the ghostly priest, or priestly ghost, addressed his brother in the flesh and the congregation. He said they were taking unnecessary trouble to get him out of Purgatory. The Priest might save his prayers and the penitents their pennies: They could not get him out of Purgatory, because he never was in it. Furthermore, there was no chance for him to get there, as there never was such a place as Purgatory. It was all a mistake. He should feel very much obliged if they could get him out of the spot where he was, but that was impossible. There were but two places of future existence—one of perpetual bliss, and the other of perpetual pain inherent. Only two priests ever went to Heaven—and he was not one of them. He warned them that their masses for the repose of his or any other defunct person's soul, were useless.

With that motion this remarkable ghost disappeared, and the amazed congregation dispersed.

DENOMINATIONAL OXEN IN TEXAS!

Texas is a great state. It has not only a large, growing, mixed, population, every variety of climate and soil, game and stock but its very oxen have become denominational, if not sectarian in name, character, and spirit. In proof of this, we give the following incident:—

A minister traveling along the road, met a stranger driving his waggon, which was pulled by four oxen; as the minister approached he heard the driver say,

"Get up Presbyterian!" "Gee Campbellite!" "Haw Baptist!" "What are you doing Methodist!"

The minister struck with the singularity of such names being given to oxen, remarked, "Stranger, you have strange names for your oxen; and I wish to know why they have such strange names given them."

The driver replied, "I call that lead ox so in frost, Presbyterian, because he is true blue, and never fails—he believes in pulling through every difficult place, persevering to the end, and then he knows more than all the rest. The one by his side, I call Campbellite; he does very well when you let him go his own way, until he sees water, and then all the world could not keep him out of it, and there he stands as if his journey was ended. This off ox, behind, is a real Baptist, for he is all the time after water, and will not eat with the others, but is constantly looking first on one side, and then on the other, and every thing that comes near him. The other which I call Methodist, makes a great ado, and you would think he was pulling all creation, but he don't pull a pound!"

The minister, having his curiosity gratified with the explanation given, rode on, wondering what he should next see and hear in Texas. This is no dream, but a fact, as we have heard it; nor are we influenced by dyspeptic feelings in telling our readers the ecclesiastical relation of Texas oxen.—

Ventilation of a Sick Room.

With a proper supply of windows and a proper supply of fuel in open fireplaces, fresh air is comparatively easy to secure when your patient or patients are in bed. Never be afraid of open windows then. People don't catch cold in bed. This is a popular fallacy. With proper bedclothes, and hot bottles if necessary, you can always keep a patient warm in bed, and well ventilate him at the same time. . . .

I know an intelligent, humane house surgeon who makes a practice of keeping the ward windows open. The physicians and surgeons invariably close them while going their rounds; and the house surgeon very properly as invariably opens them whenever the doctors have turned their backs. . . .

. . . Do you ever go into the bedrooms of any persons of any class, whether they contain one, two or twenty people, before the windows are opened in the morning, and ever find the air any thing but unwholesomely close and foul? And why should it be so? And of how much importance is it that it should be so? During sleep, the human body, even when in health, is far more injured by the influence of foul air than when awake. Why can't you keep the air all night, then, as pure as the air without in the rooms you sleep in? But for this your must have sufficient outlet for the pure air from without to come in. You must have open chimneys, open windows or ventilators; no close curtains round your beds; no shelter or curtains to your windows; none of the contrivances by which you undermine your own health, or destroy the chances of recovery of your sick.—Miss Nightingale.

No Relation.—Gen. Kearney had a very long Polish name. The king having heard of it, one day asked him very gravely—

"Pray, Kearney, what is your name?"

The General repeated to him, immediately, the whole of his name.

"Why," said the king, the devil never had such a name."

"I should presume not, sir," replied the General, "as he was no relation of mine."

WRECK OF THE "HUNGARIAN."

From the Yarmouth [N. S.] Tribune.

The ill-fated steamship is reported to have been seen by a sealing vessel off Liverpool, about 5 p. m., on Sunday, 19th ult., apparently steering N.N.W., which, unless she were at the distance of at least twenty-five miles from the coast, must have been nearly four points off her true course. At three o'clock on the following morning, a man named Harry Nickerson, residing on Cape Sable, deserted, exactly in the direction of the reef known as the 'Horse Race,' what he took to be the lights of a steamer. These lights when first seen were stationary and remained immovably in the same position, as our informant thinks, for more than half an hour, when they appeared to move very swiftly in a north-westerly direction, and in the course of ten or fifteen minutes became once more stationary. Mr. Henry Nickerson, who resides on Fish Island, states that he first saw the light in the position which the wreck now occupies, at four o'clock, and comprehending that some unknown vessel was in distress, aroused his son and a neighbor, crossed in a fishing skiff the inlet which divides the island from Cape Sable, and, in the hope of attracting the attention of the crew, exhibited a lighted lantern from the highest point of land that could be there found.

The lights of the unknown vessel continued to be visible until daybreak, when they disappeared, probably in consequence of the fall of the mast to which they were attached. As day dawned, the hull of a large steamship was plainly discernable on the "Great Rip," a dangerous ledge about two miles south-west of Cape Sable, the foremast gone, the mainmast, mizzenmast, and smokepipe only standing, and the sea making a constant breach over the ship.—The rigging of the mainmast had the appearance, according to the statement of our informants, of being crowded with human beings, to the number of between fifty and sixty—a supposition we see no reason to discredit. About half an hour after sunrise, the mainmast was seen to go overboard, the smokepipe disappeared soon afterwards, and the mizzenmast followed about ten a.m.—The spectacle is described by those who witnessed it as one of terrific grandeur—the sea around white with breakers the doomed ship rolling heavily, an surge after surge broke against her iron sides, the spray dashing in volumes to the height of her mast head, and the billows pouring in ceaseless cataracts over her decks.

The violence of the sea during the morning and the early part of the day was so great that no attempt could be made to approach the ship. Not even a life-boat, it is affirmed, could have been got with safety through the breakers which environed the coast.

At 9 a.m., the wreck began to break up, and the surface of the deep was soon strewn with packages of light goods, the lading of her upper decks. The ebb tide, aided by a strong westerly wind, carried these articles for the first few hours in the direction of Baccaro, and into the bays and inlets beyond. The flood tide, for the next few hours, carried whatever was washed from the wreck in an opposite direction. On Tuesday, the wind having moderated, and the sea being comparatively smooth, a great number of boats and several small vessels put off in search of the drifting merchandize. Between four and five hundred boats, it is computed, were for the first three or four days engaged in this manner. The bales being generally of a size which precluded their being taken into a boat, were broken open with a few blows of an axe, the contents lifted on board, and the box allowed to go adrift. The quantity of goods thus saved must have been immense; but their wide dispersion will render the task of collecting them for sale rather a formidable undertaking.

Several of the mail bags of the Hungarian were picked up on Tuesday, and one or two others on the following day. These were taken charge of by the magistrates, and have ere now been forwarded to Halifax. A boat of about 15 feet keel, with the oars lashed, drifted into Port Latour, bottom up. Other boats shattered to pieces, have been seen floating in the vicinity. The quarter of one of them was picked up by Capt. Cook, of the schooner Melrose, on Saturday. One of the masts came ashore at Shag Harror, and another at Fish Island. The latter spar has still attached to it a portion of the plate iron by which it was connected with the decks. The only bodies yet found were that of a man, supposed to have been one of the firemen of the ship, which was found at Shag Harbor, and that of a female child, about two years old which was washed ashore at Stoney Island. Inquests were held on both these bodies, and both were decently interred. The report that the body of a man had been discovered at Cat Point, near Baccaro, is without foundation, as is also, we hope, the statement that the corpse of an infant picked up at sea, was consigned again to the deep by the owner of the boat, in his eagerness to secure the tempting prizes with which the surface of the water at the time was covered.

LATEST FROM THE BRITISH WEST INDIES.

GREAT FIRE AT BARBADOES.

The West Indian published at Bridgetown, Barbadoes, under date of February 15, contains a long account of a destructive fire at Bridgetown on the night of February 13th.

The fire broke out in Mr. Alleyne's lumber yard, from which it spread to Mr. Gabbett's adjoining, and Messrs. Barrow & Dunnosh's dry goods establishment in High street. Before any effectual means of checking it were available, it became unmanageable.

From Barrow & Dunnosh's it spread to other houses. It then seized upon the Royal Buildings of the commissariat office on the south, on the opposite side of High st., which were soon destroyed to ashes. On the other side the fire spread from Alleyne's and Jones's lumber and coal yards across Gable st. to Messrs. Trowbridge's store, into Merhill street in the east and the Green on the south.

The flames precipitated across Nelson square to the range of stores running on to the bridge, and Bridge st. to the entrance. Thus the three sides of the square presented an enclosure of flames with Merhill's lumber yard in the middle, like a focus, immediately in front of which stood the statute of the old hero.

The military and police came to the aid of the civil authorities, and effectually endeavored to check the progress of the flames. Several buildings were blown down. The high wall separating the district, southern of the town and the fire to other buildings.—Queen, Lucas and Bowker yards were destroyed. The west end of the town still burns. The West Indian says:

The extent of ground covered, we are about say, fully as large, if not larger, than the fire of 1845, and a large portion being in the centre of the business part of the town, the value of the property destroyed must be much greater. It is cautiously estimated at from a million of dollars to a million of pounds, and the general opinion seems to fix it at £500,000, a very inconsiderable portion of which we regret to say is insured—not exceeding £30,000.

We are happy to add that we have not heard of any worse accidents than a few bruises from the falling timbers of the houses. There was a great crowd of people of both sexes and all ages, moving about and watching with interest the progress of the fire. They were very peaceable and quiet and the women particularly exerted themselves in relieving the distressed, and removing property. But there are great complaints of the indifference and unwillingness of the men in assisting to check the fire.

If we are to deal out censures, we certainly are of opinion that the conduct of the authorities deserves a considerable share of the blame for indifference and inactivity as well as for incompetency.

The Toronto University: a Committee to inquire into its management.—The money question: free trade to be further tested.—The Temperance Question: Upper Canada's opinion sholved off by the French.—Galt's Financial Schems: he should be put in the scituess Box.—The subsidy to Steamers: Upper Canada demands inquiry by 25 to 1 and is refused.—The Convention Platform: a speedy discussion anticipated; Francis Hincks favors the Opposition.

QUEBEC, March 19, 1860.

A large number of petitions have been presented by the Wesleyans for enquiry into the Financial management of the University of Toronto. A committee will be struck with that object, which will have power to send for persons and papers, and a full investigation will be had. The feeling of the House is favourable to an investigation of the financial management of the institution, but a feeling of unwillingness exists to do anything that would prostrate the University, or impair its usefulness.

There has been a very lengthy debate on the Usury Bill. The question was argued purely on its merits, and was not treated as a political question. Several persons who voted for the abolition of the Usury laws now demand them re-enacted, while on the other hand, some of those who opposed free trade in money, now advocate it. The law to prevent Usury was practically evaded, and would be again if re-enacted. The feeling of the House is decidedly in favor of testing the existing law. The bill—one introduced by Cauchon—was therefore thrown out by a vote of 60 to 50. We have passed through an unexampled crysis. The demand for money has been general and extensive, and it is not surprising that a higher rate should have been demanded by the money lenders. However, a large influx of British capital has been induced, and competition must put it down to its true value.

Malcolm Cameron has introduced a bill to prevent the sale by retail, of liquors, except for certain necessary purposes. It does not propose to touch existing licenses. I was at first sanguine that the bill would carry. But the western traitors propose to introduce a bill, which will doubtless get the support of the French, and then Upper Canada will be prevented from getting her popular vote expressed.

Simpson of Niagara has given notice of a bill with the object of choking off Upper Canada by French aids. It proposes simply a modification of the licensing system, and does not strike at the root of the evil at all. Thus Upper Canada is denied any legislature at all, except such as suits French ideas. If there are any money to be spent, we are made to pay; but practical reforms are persistently refused us.

If there is one reason stronger than another why Mr Brown should have been placed on the Public Accounts Committee, it is from the evidence of jobbing that Galt's financial operations in England exhibit. He went there requiring only about £800,000 and speedily took £2,000,000. He transferred the stock at a ruinous rate, and then among advantages that justify the strongest out-cry[illegible]. He ought to be put in the witness box before the Public Accounts' Committee, and made to give an account of himself. When the Opposition got an opportunity of replying to his financial statements, which will be in the course of this week, the operations of this stock-jobber will be fully shown, and his chicanery, by which Canada has lost tens of thousands, will be fully set forth. The Government feared that this would be done by Mr Brown, and then dared not allow him to scrutinize the Public Accounts.

On Friday night the Upper Canada Opposition fought inch by inch against the second reading of the bill to increase the annual subsidy to the Canadian line of steamers of $300,000. Upper Canada, who pays $270,930 out of every $400,000, and who will pay $140,000 of this subsidy to Rimouski Quebec's $60,000, demanded to know how the money was spent—whether it was even necessary, or whether it could be sufficient—but her votes was drowned by Cartier and his French tail. McDougall moved that a committee of nine should be appointed to enquire into the expediency and propriety of the bill; but Cartier said "no," and the Upper Canada band of traitors were a party to the sale of their own country. The motion of McDougall was lost by 63 yeas to 47 nays. Of the 63 who voted for granting $3 more Upper Canadian, while only 10 Upper Canadians voted against. J. Cameron, who had before voted against supporting the line of the Gulf and who was of Western, now changed [illegible] Rankin, of Toronto, and Fergusson Blair, of the working men. This done we will guarantee there will be very little risk in the success of the association. After that you may depend things will be little better than they are now. We understand adjourning of Mechanics will be held in a few days to consider the propriety of organizing a new Lyceum. We would suggest that if an equitable arrangement could be come to with the present Institute it would be the better plan.

A return from the Town Treasurer showing the state of cart and livery licenses for the last year and also the state of the Collectors' Roll was submitted.

The Mayor renewed his notice oftentimes before given to the Council, that the lock-up, heretofore used by the police was utterly unfit for the purpose, and that for the want of a suitable place to confine disorderly persons, they must be allowed to continue their annoyance undisturbed, the County Council having ordered that they shall not be admitted into the county gaol

The Mayor also again drew attention to the danger from fire and thieft, the documents and papers in the clerk's office are exposed to for the want of a safe wherein the most important ones might be deposited.

Mr. O'Beirne moved, seconded by Mr. Walton,—That Messrs Morrow, Toel and Ryan, be appointed a special committee to examine into the present condition of the lock-up house in the Town Hall, and report upon the same at the next meeting of this Council, and that the said committee be requested if they find the present lock-up be insufficient, to make some suggestion at the next meeting as to what measures are most advisable to be taken to supply the want.—Carried.

A report from the committee on Finance was read by the chairman.

Mr. Ryan signed who were the members of the Finance Committee, and was informed that they were Messrs. Ormond, the chairman, Chamberlain, O'Beirne and Ryan

Mr. Ryan would like to have it explained how the chairman brought in this report, as he, Mr. Ryan had not been consulted or had anything concerning it been submitted to him.

Mr. O'Beirne assumed the responsibility of it. He had drawn out the report in conjunction with Mr. Ormond and put it in his pocket to get Mr Ryans signature, and forgot the doing of it.

The Mayor said it was not Mr. Ryan alone, who had to complain of the manner in which committee meetings were carried on. The refreshment to be with them to form a club which when a majority was had, proceeded to business in some private place, generally Mr Ormond's brick shop, and after making a report produced it in Council as the act of the committee.—Such although the Mayor told them was very unbecoming. Every member of the committee was to have notice of the meeting, that the Council might have the benefit of each one's judgment, and that each one might have the opportunity of informing himself upon the subject, and, when in opposition, of enlightening the minds of his brethren committee who is his own. For his own part, the Mayor said that although he was, by his office, a member of every committee, he never knew when they met or what they did until they came into Council.

Mr. Ormond referring to a vote taken in the Council, which the Mayor could if he desired it, have recorded, and upon which the Mayor said that he was not inclined to interfere with the action of the Council when it could be avoided, took upon himself to argue that it was not necessary to give him any notice of committee meetings. And as to the meetings in his back shop, Mr. Ormond could remind the Mayor that at the time of elections he never objected to the back shop being a committee room.

The Mayor reminded Mr. Ormond that whatever was the practice at election times it could not be made a rule for the guidance of the Council. Before election parties were divided and each being in opposition to the other necessitated private arrangements. But when the election is over the Council should feel that they were performing a duty to their constituents, and throw aside election tactics. And as to the places for committees to meet, they should be on public ground where every one would be at home and feel free, which might not happen in "the back premises."

The License Inspector by order of Council handed in a report of the Licenses taken out for the year, and also the names of parties known to him as being liable to license but who had not done so.

A petition from John Hodson praying for a Saloon License was read.

Mr. Maloney moved, seconded by Mr. Harty,—That a License be granted to Mr John Hodson by his paying the amount demanded.—Lost on a division.

Mr. Ormond moved, seconded by Mr. Walton.—That the Treasurer do at once pay the following claims against the town, viz., Messrs Robertson & Co. for verandah around the Town Hall, $370 50, and Messrs McDougall & Co. for lumber $93 83c.

Mr O'Beirne moved, seconded by Mr Morrow,—That with a view of expediting the proceedings against Mr. John Fowler to recover the arrears due by him to the town, the Mayor be authorized and empowered, on behalf, and in the name of the Corporation of the Town of Peterboro', to give to Mr Quinlan any indemnity that the solicitor in charge of the suit may recommend, and that the Mayor do execute any instrument which the solicitor may approve of for the purpose on behalf of the Corporation.—Carried.

Mr Ryan moved seconded by Mr. O'Beirne,—That for the purpose of forwarding and assisting in the proceedings against Mr. John Fowler, for arrears due the corporation, Mr Morrow be requested to go down to Port Hope as soon as he conveniently can for the purpose of ascertaining definitely whether or not Mr. Quinlan consents to his name being used in the suit and that Mr Morrow be authorized to treat with Mr Quinlan in the matter, and do whatever may be judged necessary for and in the name of the Corporation of the Town of Peterborough, and further, also, that Mr Morrow be paid his expenses in the matter.—Carried.

Mr O'Beirne moved, seconded by Mr. Ormond,—That the Treasurer do pay the amounts due on the Division Court judgments in the suits brought against the Town by Mr William Fletcher, and Mr Thomas White, jr.—Carried.

Mr O'Beirne moved, seconded by Mr Walton,—That the Printing Committee be requested to take into consideration what arrangements for the Printing of the Corporation for the present year may be necessary and suggest to the Council at its next meeting.—Carried.

The following petition from Mr. James Leary was not considered respectful to their highnesses, and

On motion of Mr Morrow, seconded by Mr Ormond, it was ordered that the petition should not be received.

The vote stood, for receiving—
Messrs Harty, Maloney and Ryan.
Against receiving—
Messrs Toole, Morrow, Ormond, Walton and O'Beirne.

To the Mayor and Council of the Town of Peterborough.

GENTLEMEN,

Your Petitioner has lately fitted up a Saloon on the East-side of the Market Square, Peterboro', and having considerably exhausted means in order to make it a suitable place for the business, would request your honorable body to indulge your petitioner by extending time for the payment of the License, say half the sum down and the balance in six months,

And your petitioner in duty bound will ever pray.

JAMES LEARY.

TERRIBLE AFFAIR IN ARKANSAS.

From the Memphis Avalanche, March 3.

The particulars of a most bloody tragedy, which was enacted in Cortland county, Arkansas, near St. Francis River, about 25 miles from this city, came to our knowledge yesterday. On the night of the 21st ult., a man named Robinson was shot at through a window and instantly killed by some person on the outside of the house. When the diabolical deed was committed, no one afterwards ascertained, nobody was in the house with him but his wife, and he was in the act of undressing preparatory to going to bed.

The whole matter remained buried in the deepest mystery until several days had elapsed, when some of the neighbors of the murdered man arrested his wife on suspicion.—She confessed that she knew something of the killing and implicated two brothers, whose names our informant did not ascertain. On Wednesday last the two men were arrested. One of them confessed that it was arranged that when Robinson was put out of the way he was to marry his widow, and that he had paid his brother one hundred dollars to do the deed. A vigilance committee was formed, and on Thursday the two men were taken to the woods and hung. The supposition also resolved to hang the women, and was to have executed the sentence yesterday. Altogether, the affair is one of the bloodiest records of crime and speedy retribution we ever heard of.

COMMUNICATION.

THE WIRE PULLERS HARD AT WORK.

RENEWED EFFORTS TO DESTROY OUR UNIVERSITY.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

DEAR SIR.—The committee of the Methodist Conference are busy using every appliance at their command to push forward the darling object of that clerical combination. District conventions, are passing resolutions and forwarding petitions to Parliament. Individuals are going round with petitions soliciting persons to sign them, the prayer of all being to scatter the University funds among the Colleges, and to Victoria in particular.

In our Town some of the faithful have been round with a memorial which prays as I am told to have Victoria College endowed in common with other Colleges in the country, and I regret that men who should know better, will ask Parliament to endow, all the Colleges when they know or should know, that the Catholics have three out of the eight Colleges in U. C., to be endowed. Thus while the Methodists will receive 6s. 8d., the Catholics will receive a pound, if what the former ask Parliament for, is granted. Look at them, Victoria, Queen's, Knox and Trinity, St. Michael, Regiopolis and Bytown. The other Protestant institutions, don't advocate state endowment for Colleges. The Conference memorial has been laid before Parliament by the "coon" of the West who took opportunity to speak very favourably of the followers of John Wesley. I was pleased to find, however, on being interrogated, that his Presbyterian-ism and good sense, predominated over his truckling, and he honestly confessed he had no desire to seek to disturb the integrity of University endowment. He said the object he sought was to have an investigation made as to how the affairs of the University and other institutions were being administered—so far, so well—no one objects to the most thorough scrutiny, and all will approve any measures inaugurated to stay corruption or the needless or extravagant expenditure of public money. A restless spirit, whose delight is to Methodize every institution in the country, has published another letter and sent it around. Its aim is to damage the National institutions, and to deride every one that opposes the grasping scheme of the Conference. He calls in question a statement of the organ of that body, and more than intimates, that it is in error. He affects to believe, and he wishes all who read his letter to believe that the £1,5000 lent by order of the Governor in Council, to the Buffalo, Brantford, and Goderich Railway Company, has not been returned. The loan was made on the 7th of March, 1856, and repaid on the 16th of July 1856, as see appendix No. 28, 1857, No. 7, also the Return to an address for all principal moneys received by the University. The Rev. gentleman's dishonesty is so palpable that it requires but little trouble to expose it, and here where he is known we are not at all surprised at his statements. He will call in question any statement conflicting with his own, and put his own veracity here was impeached and found wanting.—If an organization or a body interposed in any way between the views of Methodists, his reverence is out upon it or them. He rakes and scrapes among all the sewerages to bring to light their filth, hold them up to ridicule, calls upon the faithful to oppose them as Methodism, as either ignorant or not sufficiently acknowledged. His arrogance is equalled only by his unscrupulousness and misrepresentation.

I sincerely rejoice Mr. Editor, notwithstanding all the efforts put forth by the Methodist hierarchy to secure the destruction of our noble University and the endowment by the state of their denominational College, that all shades of politics in the Legislature so far as expressed have shown that they will oppose any disturbance of the endowment for denominational purposes The supreme selfishness of the Conference is covered with a flimsy show of patriotism, as hollow an that of their master spirit who erewhile bartered all his for a mess of pottage.

Yours very truly,

J. E.

THE GALT JUGGLE.

The ministry have succeeded in converting the Montreal Gazettee into a worshipper of Galt; it was probably not difficult to do, but the Montreal Commercial Advertiser is still obdurate. It cannot see anything divine in the juggle. Hear it:—

"One of the avowed objects of Mr. Galt's new loan was the redemption of 6 per cent. currency bonds to the amount of £1,200,000; so far the result has been in this respect a perfect failure. On the day of the payment of the first instalment, bonds to the amount of £35,688 only were brought in, and on the day of the second, only £7,367: in all £43,055, or about four per cent. of the amount expected.

"The terms of the loan being very favourable to those who pay up in full, there was paid in cash upon the, 16th of January £1,088,188 19s., of which £899,146 15s. was in full, and the balance first instalment of ten per cent.; and on the first of February $866,871 2s. 8d., of which £795,941 was in full. Of the whole loan only $761,370 remains to be received, and the account stands thus:—

Whole amount of loan..	2,800,000	0	0
Received in cash.....	1,955,080	1	0
Do bonds.....	42,036	4	7
Instalments due.....	761,370	0	0
Gross proceeds....	£2,569,486	6	3
Discounts.....	40,513	13	9

"There is, therefore, if the published accounts are correct, an unaccounted deficiency of £400,000.

"The provincial agents for their trouble in receiving applications and collecting the instalments, get £28,000, and the brokers have already had £3,288, and more claims are expected; deducting these sums from the gross proceeds, and the net result of the operation is, we have incurred a debt of £3,360,000, and we have received for it in cash and bonds, and instalments not yet due, £2,760,000, so that we come out poorly out of the operation, as a man whose necessities have driven him to the bill-sharers.

"But turning from the ostensible to the real object of Mr. Galt's juggle, we find our position very much worse. The real object of the loan, as proved by the documents laid before Parliament, was to raise the wind. The [illegible] is in debt to the Locality upwards £360,000, £250,000 was wanted for the Victoria Tower, and $500,000 for the buildings at Ottawa; in all £360,000 to obtain which, under a false name, the Minister of Finance has gone a horse of £171,862.

"So that after all this extensive collapse all his previous operations, leaving the Saltern River Gold Mine, the St. Lawrence and Atlantic Stock, and the Grand Trunk Railway bubble entirely in the shade.

"The Financial Agents of the Province before bringing out the scheme stipulated for £1,500,000 of the stock, on the same terms allowed to other subscribers; at 97½ this cost them £1387,500, and was immediately saleable at 103½, or £1535,000; their immediate profits on the loan were therefore:

Premium on £500,000 Stock....	£17,500
Commission on Loan.....	28,000
	£75,500

"A gain of £75,500 for a few days trouble is a tolerably satisfactory one; and it cannot be wondered that Messrs. Baring Brothers & Co., and Glyn, Mills & Co., who a few months ago called our clever Finance Minister a swindler, and refused to have any dealings with him, should have smoked the calumet of peace, and sworn a perpetual friendship with him.

They gain moreover the incidental advantage of the possession and use of a large sum for £1,85[illegible],060 received by them, £400,000 was required to purchase India stock, and the further sum of £433,000 in April for the same purpose on account of the Imperial Guaranteed Loan, leaving in their hands £1,112,060.

"Of this they received £300,000 to cover advances made by them to the Provincial Government, not due until next October, and the balance is left in their hands to loan on call, they paying interest at the minimum Bank of England rate not exceeding 4 per cent., or to purchase at par such Municipal Loan Fund Bonds as are offered. They have already loaned £50,000 on the same amount of 6 per cent. Provincial Bonds at 5 per cent; £65,000 on Toronto City Bonds, 20 per cent. less than their face, on the same terms, and £35,000 on other securities. So that the province of Canada has been paying a large premium to borrow money at £5 per cent. in order to lend it out again at less than 4½ per cent.

"Such are a few of the facts elicited from the published documents having reference to the consolidation of the public debt the consolidation consisting in increasing it nearly £2,800,000, and under the pretence of diminishing the burdens of the country, adding to them most materially.

"Verily, the Finance Minister is a great genius, and Galt may yet become a worthy rival and successor of Law."

ARRIVAL OF THE "CIRCASSIAN."

ST. JOHNS, NEWFOUNDLAND, March 15.

The steamship Circassian, with Galway dates to the 3rd inst., and London dates by telegraph to the 3rd inst., arrived here this forenoon.

Lord John Russell has introduced a Reform Bill. It extends the election franchise to ten pound occupancies in counties and six pound in boroughs; twenty-five of the smallest boroughs are to have one instead of two members, and the seats thus gained are to be distributed between the most populous counties and boroughs. Ireland and Scotland, get two additional members each; a corresponding reduction is made in the franchise but the present representation is not to be disturbed.

The speech of the Emperor Napoleon on the opening of the French Legislature, says that Tuscany is to be a separate kingdom, that Parma and Modena may be annexed to Sardinia, and that France requires Savoy for the security of her frontiers. He hopes that the great Powers will see the necessity of this.

The Liberal journals are not satisfied with the measure.

Further progress has been made in the budget, and Mr. Gladstone's recommendations thus far have been carried.

The Atlantic Telegraph Company had adopted the report of the Board of Directors, and agreed to raise £20,000 to make the attempt to resuscitate the cable, or recover as much of it as possible.

The steamer Nemard had been wrecked on her passage from Liverpool to Cork.—All on board, about 50 in number, were drowned.

ITALY.

The Pope is said to be ready to make concessions.

A Paris letter in the Nord contains some information relative to the settlement of the Italian question:—

"As the negotiations relative to Italy have entered into a critical phase, it is important to state facts clearly and to avoid exaggerations. A journal of Brussels describes as an ultimatum the despatch sent on the 25th ult. to Milan, and in which the French Government sets forth the arrangements which it considers as the most practicable in Italy. The despatch takes care to declare that the Emperor of the French does not intend to exercise any pressure on the determinations of the Cabinet of Turin. It is, therefore, merely a programme which has been sent to Piedmont. In this document, M. Thouvenel considers the annexation of Tuscany as becoming more and more difficult, and he insists anew on that old duchy being constituted into a separate State, under the authority of a prince chosen by the population. The Emperor excludes the candidateship of Prince Napoleon, in order to remain faithful to the policy of disinterestedness proclaimed at the beginning of the war in Italy. Romagna cannot either, it is said, be annexed to Piedmont, but must be administered under the viceroiate of the King of Sardinia, if that solution be accepted by the Pope. Piedmont, therefore, will only be aggrandized by the Duchies of Parma and Modena. Nevertheless the cession of Savoy and of the country of Nice is represented to be indispensible.—The despatch is most friendly in tone, and is in conformity with the good relations which have not ceased to exist between the two cabinets."

SPAIN AND MOROCCO.

A treaty of peace is proposed. The demands of Spain are exorbitant.

In the London stock market the Emperor's speech was not considered satisfactory, and prices closed at a decline of ¼. Consols for money 93¼ a 94.

FRANCE.

The French Legislature opened on the 1st inst. The Emperor's speech promises every effort for the maintenance of peace; rejoices at amicable relations with all European powers, and hopes for a speedy peace with Central China, and great advancement of the Chinese for their perfidy. The Emperor also hopes that Italian affairs are approaching a settlement; and says he has advised the Pope of Rome, that Tuscany must not be allowed, but that the estranged states [illegible] provinces ought to contribute, provided the rights of the Holy See are respected in principle. He professes astonishment at the opposition of the Catholic world, and points to his efforts on behalf of the Pope. The French army has been reduced by 150,000 men, and could be further reduced but for the Chinese war and the Italian occupation. He concludes by referring to the new free trade policy, and the prediction of a most favourable result. The [illegible] of the French frontier, he adds, required the annexation of Savoy, and he hopes that a frank explanation of the question will cause the great Powers to recognize the justice of the claim.

The Speech produced a slight depression on the Paris Bourse.

The English journals protest against the annexation of Savoy.

It is reported that Prince Lucien Bonaparte will probably be proposed as King of Tuscany.

The London Chronicle [illegible] the statement relative to the treaty of alliance between Austria and Russia, but says the treaty has since been modified.

The Journal du Strasbourg gives an official denial to the statements concerning Central Italy. The votes of the people are to be taken for annexation to Piedmont.

The Pope threatens Victor Emmanuel with excommunication.

The annexation of Savoy by France is condemned by the English Ambassador.

AUSTRIA.

The Vienna correspondent of the Times says the Emperor now listens with more complacency to the counsels of his Generals than those of his more official advisers. The former wish to renew the war, urge the necessity of increasing the army, and the reinforcement of the forces in Venetia. The news that the French artillery is to be increased renders the high military party more pugnacious. Austrian statesmen are of opinion that eventually there will be a general collision against the Emperor Napoleon.

A report is current that the organization of the Imperial Council on a wider basis has received the sanction of the Emperor. The Emperor will appoint the Princes and high functionaries as members of Council. The deputations of the eighteen provinces will elect about forty members, by preparing three candidates for each membership.

A periodical convocation of the Council is to take place to deliberate on the Budget, to examine projects of law, and to receive memorials and petitions of the deputations of the country. The first assembling of the Council is to take place in the coming month.

THE ITALIAN QUESTION.

MUNICH, March 1.—The semi-official Munchener Zeitung says:—We learn from reliable quarters that the Emperor Napoleon does not consent to the annexation of the Romagna to Piedmont, and that he is about to reconstitute the integrity of the States of the Church, and to modify essentially the policy which he has hitherto followed.

The Opinione Nationale says it is anticipated that Count Cavour would resign as soon as the telegraph summary of the Emperor's speech reached Turin. Le Nord says that the reply of the Sardinian Government to the new propositions of France is to the effect that the whole question must depend on the result of a vote by universal suffrage.

RUSSIA.

ST. PETERSBURG, March 1.—The Journal de St. Petersburg gives an official denial to the statement relative to an alliance between Russia and Austria.

The Asia arrived at New York on the 16th, with the same dates as the Circassian.

GREAT BRITAIN.

On the 2nd in the House of Commons Lord John Russell explained the Savoy question. He said as far as he knew no treaty was in existence between France and Sardinia providing for the annexation. The Emperor states that he will not proceed to the annexation without consulting the great Powers, and he (Lord John Russell) believed if the Powers were unanimously opposed to the movement, France would not proceed to attempt it.

Sir Robert Peel declared that the statements of Lord John Russell were highly unsatisfactory, and hoped Parliament would have an early opportunity of discussing the subject.

Mr. Bright hoped the Government would neither countenance or oppose the transfer, it being a matter over which they had no control or any real interest.

After further remarks by Lord John Russell, in which he deprecated discussion, the subject was dropped.

Lord Palmerston, in reply to an enquiry said he had received a memorial from Irish Catholics requesting his interference in maintaining the integrity of the Papal dominions.

The English papers publish an appeal to Christians throughout the world, signed by [illegible] exiles from Arkansas, who protest in the strongest terms against the system which dooms them either to banishment or slavery.

The English journals generally regard Napoleon's speech to the Legislative Assembly with disfavor.

The Paris Bourse of the 2nd was very heavy, but closed rather firm.

A battalion of Spaniards had been surprised and defeated by the Moors in the neighbourhood of the fortress of Melilla—200 soldiers and five officers are said to have been killed, and twelve officers and 200 men wounded.

ARRIVAL OF THE "TEUTONIA."

NEW YORK, March 19.

The steamship Teutonia arrived yesterday from Bremen. She brings London dates to March 8. Her commercial news is no later than that received by the Asia.

The commencement of the loss of the Hungarian reached London on the 6th inst. by telegraph from Queenstown, on which point the Canada touched that morning. The Kings arrived at Liverpool on the same day.

The London Court Journal asserts positively that the Prince of Wales would leave for Canada about the latter part of May, probably in the [illegible] Hero. He will [illegible] as Aide-de-camp to his father, and will be known as Aide-de-camp to the Governor General.

HOUSE OF ASSEMBLY.

Mr. Robinson moved that the correspondence between the Government of Great Britain and the Government of Canada respecting the knighthood of Mr. Speaker Smith, be laid on the table. He said he was surprised that no explanations on the subject had yet been given to the House.—He attributed the success which had attended the presentation of the address to Her Majesty to the exertions of Mr. Smith, and wished to know why the honour justly due to one of the most distinguished Canadian subjects was so justly withheld. If there was correspondence on the subject it was due to the House and the country that it should be produced.

The Speaker asked leave to withdraw during the discussion, and called Mr. Dorion to the chair.

Mr. Attorney General Cartier said there was no correspondence between the British and Canadian Governments on the subject.

Mr. Brown asked in what capacity Mr. Smith went to England, whether as deputed by the Province of Canada to present the address, or as a mere messenger of the Government.

Attorney Gen. Cartier said the Governor General gave Mr. Smith a letter of introduction to Sir Bulwer Lytton,

Mr McGee said that the Speaker of the Barbadoes House was at the same time in London, and was knighted through the influence of the Governor of Barbadoes, but the magnificent Speaker of this magnificent House was not knighted. The inference was that Mr. Hincks' little finger had more weight with the Home Government than all the influence of the Canadian Government to procure the recognition of the claims of the Speaker of the Canadian House of Assembly. The Government should explain the cause of this marked slight on the Province of Canada,

Mr Starnes said, Mr McGee, on the part of the Opposition, should move an address, praying that Mr Speaker Smith be knighted.

Mr McGee said that he did not say that the Speaker should be knighted; but that he should not be slighted

Mr Starnes said that he had himself carried a letter of introduction from the Governor General to Mr. Labouchere, and had got a good dinner and an invitation to a ball but he had never thought of being knighted.

Mr Foley said the conferring of the knighthood was an act of Royal Grace, and the House should not presume to enquire into the causes why it was withheld.

Mr. Brown said this was simply a little family quarrel in the Ministerial ranks. A prominent member of the old Conservative party was sent to England with an address to the Queen from this House. He naturally expected knighthood, and perhaps some of his colleagues were not desirous that he should receive it. The Premier had been at Windsor and probably thought himself quite as great a man as the Speaker, and yet he had not been knighted. Mr. Macdonald, Attorney General West, perhaps thought his late Solicitor General had less claims than himself to the honor. The Inspector General also had managed to negotiate a loan of £2,800,000 at 96½ but was not knighted. The Government had not advanced Mr. Smith's claims. He thought the motion placed the House in a ludicrous position before the country. Such titles of distinction were out of place on this continent, and people despised them.

Mr. Wilson agreed with Mr. Brown that such titles were unsuited to the position and habits of our people.

Mr. Gowan entirely dissented from Mr. Brown and Mr. Wilson, and approved of such titles as the reward of public service.

Mr. Tyrwhitt defended the titles and instanced the case of Sir L. H. Lafontaine.

Mr. Brown said it was more excusable in the case of Sir L. H. Lafontaine, than when the degree was given on account of party services or persons happening at the moment to occupy particular positions, but Lafontaine's services would have been remembered without the "Sir." He came from the people, belonged to the people, and perhaps would have been more honored in the memories of his countrymen had he not received the prefix.

The motion was withdrawn.

Wednesday, 14th March.

One hundred and five petitions were brought up and laid on the table.

Hon. Mr. Alleyn delivered a message from His Excellency the Governor General, which was read by Mr. Speaker, as followeth:—

EDMUND HEAD,

The Governor General transmits, for the information of the Legislative Assembly a copy of a Despatch from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, acknowledging the receipt of the joint address of last session respecting the Hudson's Bay Company.

Government House,

HOW TO RAISE EARLY POTATOES.

A dish of new mealy potatoes, about the middle of July is not to be despised. They are good upon the table, and by no means bad in the barrel, on their way to a freely market, at one or two dollars a bushel, and upwards. There is a difference of a month or two in the time required by different varieties to mature. The fact is often overlooked by farmers, and they continue planting only the late sorts, and have no new potatoes until August. Early varieties are at first emeaied in getting an early harvest. The Mercer or Chenango, will mature in about twelve weeks, and with forcing in ten. It is not so apt to rot when forced, as when planted late. The early Severe go, Carpenter, Studley's Seedling, Wendell's Seedling, Dykman, and the early June, require a still shorter season, say from six to twelve weeks. In almost every section of the country there are early potatoes, probably quite as good as any of these.

There are several methods of hastening their maturity. A favorite method with the German market gardeners is, to bring the seed potatoes in barrels into a warm room about the first of March. The eyes start rapidly, and in about three weeks they are ready to plant. Another method which we have practiced for some years, is to start the potatoes in a gentle hot-bed about the middle of March. The tubers are cut in halves, and laid flat side down upon the bed, as thick as they can be placed. They are then covered with about two inches of garden mold, and the seabes are put over them. As soon as they are up two or three inches, they are ready to transplant. They should be removed carefully, separating the roots with as little breaking as possible, and put in the drills where they are to grow. As they do not yield a full crop under this treatment, they can be planted closer, than in common field culture, say in drills thirty inches apart, putting the hills twelve inches apart in the drill.

A warm, sandy loam, sloping to the south or south-east, should be selected for this crop. It should be well manured with horse dung, about half of it applied in the drills. Some manure their ground for early potatoes in the Fall, and this is we think a good plan for that part of the manure which is applied broadcast. Fresh horse-dung in the drills raises the temperature of the soil, and hastens their growth.

REMARK.—To the above, written by one of our associates, we will add that we have succeeded well on a small scale, thus far. Two or three weeks before the time when it will probably do to plant out, take pieces of turf or sod, say four to five inches square and put a piece of potatoe in each. These are set closely together where they can be watered if needed, and can be exposed to sunshine. Whenever there is a cold night, or a cold snap," straw is put on them to keep them from freezing. They sprout and fill the turf with roots. At the proper time the pieces are set in the open ground, one piece in a hill, and the growth is hardly checked. The turf itself also acts as a measure to aid the growth. In this way two to four weeks may be gained. American Agriculturist.

HOW TO MAKE GOOD COFFEE.

Although coffee is a beverage in daily use in almost every family, there are comparatively few who appear to know how to make a really good cup of it. Generally the first thing Biddy does in the morning is to make the coffee, no matter if it is an hour before any other portion of the breakfast will be ready. During the whole of this time it is boiling furiously, and the house is filled with its fragrance. This fragrance is very agreeable, but unfortunately, when you have it, you gratify your satisfactories at the expense of your palate; for I am perfectly satisfied that this over boiling produces that acrid bitter taste so often found in coffee. My plan is to leave the making of the coffee until the last moment. Having the boiling water ready, and my ground coffee properly mixed and cleared, I pour the boiling water over the coffee, and then allow it to boil one-half a minute. Try it, if you doubt the correctness of my method.

HOT BEDS.

No family with a good garden should be without a hot bed; in which to raise their cabbage, tomato, cauliflower and egg plants. It is a very simple contrivance, and can be made by any one of the most trifling expenses. All that is necessary is a couple of old window sashes, or rough ones made by a carpenter, the glass can be tacked in by any one. Some boards, ten or twelve inches wide, say five feet by three framed and fixed in a Luthera position, in a dry place, and set upon from eight to twelve inches of horse manure, topped with two and a half inches of fine, rich soil, the whole forming an inclined plain—complete the affair. Raising plants in hot-beds for spring use in an agreeable pastime, not a labor; and if our farmers—as many now do—would all get once in the way of it, they would never do without one.—Georgetown Telegraph.

PHONOGRAPHY,
OR
WRITING BY SOUND!!

PHONOGRAPHY was invented by ISAAC PITMAN, of Bath, England, in the year 1837. It is the most simple, most natural, most rapid, and most easily learned system of writing which has ever been, or ever can be invented.

During the past fifteen years, hundreds of thousands of persons, in England and America, in both public and private life, have learned to write Phonography, and thousands of social and business letters annually pass through the post office.

Nor is the great popularity to be wondered at. The present system of writing is exceedingly cumbersome, and totally unworthy these days of progress and invention. Phonography is equally as legible, can be learned in one twentieth the time, and can be written six times as fast! In other words, the labor of six days can be performed in one—one man can do the work of six! So simple is the system, too, that a person may learn to write it slowly, in a couple of hours. An hour's daily practice for a few weeks will enable any person to write Phonography with certainty, and with some degree of freedom. The same amount of practice continued for six months will enable a person to take reports of speeches lectures, sermons, or conversation, and to read them with accuracy.

The late Hon. THOS. H. BENTON, upon being presented with a verbatim report of one of his masterly speeches, taken by a little boy only twelve years of age, said: "Had this art been known 40 years ago it would have saved me 20 years hard labor." The learned senator spoke but a portion of the truth. What long-hand requires six years to accomplish, Phonography will perform in one.

To clergymen, Editors, Physicians, Lawyers, Secretaries, Conveyancers, Law and Medicre Students, Lecturers, Printers, School Teachers, Merchants, School Boys and Girls, a knowledge of Phonography is of vast utility. In fact there is no profession or calling in which it is not useful, and no young man's education can be considered complete without it.

During the past 9 months hundreds of persons in Canada, of every persuasion in life, have acquired the Art, from many of whom the subscriber has received neatly-written phonographic letters, expressive of their delight with the attainment, and the extraordinary ease with which they have acquired it.

For the purpose of aiding in the dissemination of so important a reform in his own country, the subscriber is now prepared to supply all who apply, with the MANUEL OF PHONOGRAPHY, and the PHONOGRAPHIC COPY BOOK, sent by mail to any part of the Province, postage pre-paid, for the small sum of ONE DOLLAR.

Anybody and everybody, who can learn anything, can learn PHONOGRAPHY from the MANUAL without other assistance. Those who wish to be able to put their thoughts to paper at the rate of from 100 to 250 words per minute, should send for the above-mentioned works at once. The instruction given by the Manual is as plain as A. B. C., and ten times as easy to understand.

Let the sick whom the faculty have abandoned resort with confidence to this ambitious agent, and a restoration to health and activity will be the unvarying result.

DYSPEPSIA.

The great sovereign of this continent yields quickly to a course of these antiseptic Pills and the digestive organs are restored to their proper tone; no matter in what hideous shape this hydra of disease exhibits itself, this searching and unerring remedy disperses it from the patient's system.

GENERAL DEBILITY AND WEAKNESS.

From whatever cause, LOSSES OF SPIRITS, and all other signs of a diseased liver, and other disorganization of the system, vanish under the eradicating influence of this all powerful antiseptic and detergent remedy.

SICKLY FEMALES

Should lose no time in trying a few doses of this regulating and renovating remedy; whatever may be their complaint, it can be taken with safety in all periodical and other disorganizations; its effect is all but miraculous.

Holloway's Pills are the best remedy known in the world for the following diseases:

Asthma,	Headaches,
Bowel Complaints,	Indigestion,
Coughs,	Influenza,
Colds,	Inflammation,
Chest Diseases,	Inward Weakness
Costiveness,	Liver Complaints,
Dyspepsia,	Lowness of Spirits,
Diarrhœa,	Piles.
Dropsy,	Stone and Gravel,
Debility,	Secondary Symptoms,
Fever and Ague,	Venereal Affections.
Female Complaints,	Worms of all kinds.

☞ CAUTION!—None are genuine unless the words "Holloway, New York and London," are discernible as a Water-mark in every leaf of the book of directions around each pot or box; the same may be plainly seen by holding the leaf to the light. A handsome reward will be given to any one rendering such information as may lead to the detection of any party or parties counterfeiting the medicines or vending the same, knowing them to be spurious.

 Sold at the Manufactory of Professor Holloway, 80 Maiden Lane, New York, and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicine throughout the United States and the civilized world, in boxes at 25 cents, 63 cents and $1 each.

☞ There is considerable saving by taking the larger sizes.

N. B.—Directions for the guidance of patients in every disorder are affixed to each box.

PRACTICAL EXPERIENCE,

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.

CONSOLATION FOR THE SUFFERING.

Nearly fifty years continual use in every part of the habitable globe, amongst the savage and the civilized alike, has proved that simple eruptions, open sores, hard tumors, scrofulous developments of all kinds, abscesses, cancers, old wounds, and, in one word, every species of inflammation and suppuration, whether in the skin, the flesh, the glands, or among the muscles, can be arrested and permanently cured, without danger, by rubbing in and using as a dressing, this inestimable Ointment.

A CERTAIN REMEDY

SCROFULA, ERYSIPELAS, AND SALT RHEUM, ERUPTIONS OF THE SKIN, PILES, AND FISTULA,

No remedy has ever done so much for the cure of diseases of the Skin, whatever form they may assume, as this Ointment. No case of Salt Rheum, Scurvy, Sore Heads, Scrofula or Erysipelas, can long withstand its influence.

BAD LEGS, OLD SORES, ULCERS, &c.

Cases of many years standing that have pertinaciously refused to yield to any other remedy or treatment, have invariably succumbed to a few applications of this powerful unguent.

Arising from a bad state of the blood or chronic disease, are eradicated, and a clear as a transparent surface regained by the restorative action of this Ointment. It supersedes many of the cosmetics and other toilet appliances in its power to dispel rashes and other disfigurements of the face.

Every form and feature of these prevalent and stubborn disorders is eradicated locally and entirely by the use of this emollient; warm fomentations should precede its application. Its healthy qualities will be found to be thorough and invariable.

Both the Ointment and Pills will be used in the following cases:

Bunions,	Skin Diseases,
Burns,	Swelled Glands,
Chapped Hands,	Sore Legs,
Chilblains,	Sore Breasts,
Fistula,	Sore Heads
Gout,	Sore Throats,
Lumbago,	Sores of all kinds,
Mercurial Eruptions,	Sprains,
Piles,	Stiff Joints,
Rheumatism,	Tetter,
Ringworm,	Ulcers,
Salt Rheum,	Venereal Sores,
Scalds,	Wounds of all kinds.

☞ CAUTION!—None are genuine unless the words "Holloway, New York and London" are discernible as a Water-mark in every leaf of the book of directions around each pot or box; the same may be plainly seen by holding the leaf to the light. A handsome reward will be given to any one rendering such information as may lead to the detection of any party or parties counterfeiting or vending the same, knowing them to be spurious.

 Sold at the manufactory of Professor Holloway, 80 Maiden Lane, New York, and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicine throughout the United States and the civilized world, in pots at 25 cents, 63 cents, and $1 each.

☞ There is a considerable saving by taking the larger sizes.

N. B.—Directions for the guidance of patients in every disorder are affixed to each pot.

IS pleasantly situated at the head of ST. PAUL STREET, amongst the largest wholesale houses in the city. It has (with business men generally, and especially with the best Merchants of both Provinces) become so great a favorite, that it is now acknowledged to be THE Business Hotel of Montreal. To meet the extensive increase, during the last year in the business of the house, the proprietor has built a large addition. The Dining Room has been extended and made more commodious; there have been completed in the new wing, a great number of well-ventilated sleeping rooms, and the House throughout has been refitted, and now contains many improvements and conveniences hitherto unknown to its guests. The whole of the beds have, at a great expence, been furnished with NEW SPRING MATTRASSES. The Proprietor expects that by continuing his personal management of the concern, THE UNION, to say the least of it, will continue to be, as it has been, the Dollar and a half Hotel in Canada.

Selected Poetry.

THE TWO TONGUES.

Oh! did you not hear in your nursery,
The tale that the gossips tell,
Of the two young girls that came to drink
At a certain fairy well?

The words of the youngest were as sweet
As the smile of her ruby lip,
But the tongue of the oldest seemed to move
As if venom were on its tip!

At the well a beggar accosted them,
(A sprite in mean disguise;)
The oldest spoke with a scornful brow,
The youngest with tearful eyes.

Cried the fairy, "Whenever you speak, sweet girl,
Pure gems from your lips shall fall—
But whenever you utter a word, proud maid,
From your tongue shall a serpent crawl."

And have you not met with these sisters oft,
In the haunts of the old and young;
The first with her pure, unsullied lip—
The last with her serpent tongue?

Yes! the first is good nature—diamonds bright
On the darkest theme she throws;
And the last is slander—leaving the slime
Of the snake wherever she goes.

"WHAT I LIVE FOR."

"I live for those who love me,
For those who know me true;
For the heaven that smiles above me,
And awaiting spirit too;
For the cause that lacks assistance,
For the wrong that needs resistance,
For the future in the distance.
And the good that I can do."

Erick's Grave.

A RUSSIAN TALE.

It was on a stormy evening, in the month of November, that a Russian nobleman, called Baron Jasolay, his wife and their little daughter, Helena, and their faithful servant Erick, in a heavy travelling chariot-and-four, driven by two postillions, drew up at the only inn in the little town of Kobrin on the borders of Russia and Poland. They were returning from their travels in Europe, and as the baron had already over-stayed the time he had intended to be absent from home, and the weather every day grew worse, he was anxious to press forward with all the speed possible. The fur caps of the postillions, the long manes and tails of the mettlesome horses, the rough leathern pouch at the carriage, were quite white with snow and frost; clouds of steam rose from the weary beasts as they were unharnessed, and made halos round the lantern which the hostler held in his hand; and the landlord, coming up to the door of the caariot, observed that, of course, his honor would not think of proceeding further.

"Not if I were at liberty to follow my own inclinations," said the Baron; "but, as it is, I am pressed for time, and we must get on another stage to-night."

"It is a very long one, sir," said the landlord; "thirty versts at the very least; and you have the forest of Restov to pass—There the road is bad, and I dare say the snow is deep; and the wolves, these long nights, are getting hungry."

"I am not afraid of wolves," cried the baron; they would not dare to attack a carriage so early in the year as this. Let us have four good horses, landlord, and we may be in by nine; for it is now no more than half-past six."

"Well, sir, a willful man may have his own way; I only hope that you may not repent your determination. Horses on, directly, Nicholas. But, may be, your honor and your honor's lady, will take something hot, for you will need it before you get to Bolsor."

So a cup of spiced wine was brought for the travellers; and Erick had a double portion. He sat, wrapped in a huge fur cloak, on a low kind of box in front; for the baron's carriage, though old-fashioned, had been made in England. In a few moments the fresh horses were harnessed, the postillions cracked their whips, and amidst the thanks and good nights of the landlord the carriage rolled on.

"It is bitterly cold," said the baroness, as she pulled her cloak more completely round her, and took the little Helena on her lap; "it is bitter cold, and a fearful night to travel in."

"If the moon can but break through the clouds, as she is trying to do, we shall have a pleasant ride yet," replied her husband. "What, Catherine, a Russian, and afraid of snow?"

"Well, I am glad we have come on, too," said the lady; "every mile is bringing us nearer home, and my own dear little Nicholas and Fredrica."

They were now passing over a wild moor; the wind whistled mournfully round the carriage, driving and chasing the snow before it, the flare of the lamps cast a kind of ghastly haze on the immediate neighbourhood of the carriage, and seemed to make the dark distance still darker.

"O mamma," cried Helena, "let me come closer to you; it makes me quite afraid to look out of the window."

"Why, what should you be afraid of, my love?"

"One is always afraid in the dark, you know, mamma; and then, just listen the wind, how it howls."

"My dear child, there is one to whom the darkness is no darkness, and who maketh the winds His ministers. We are safe in His protection here, as if we were in our own dear home, with a roof over our heads, and a bright fire roaring up the chimney.—See, the moon is coming; we shall not have to journey in the dark."

Thus, amid occasional questions and answers, the carriage rolled on for some miles. The clouds passed off; the moon was waking in brightness; the wheels rolled along over the snow; and as far as the eye could see was one glistening sea of white. And the noor was almost past; straggling trees on the outskirts of the great forest of Restov began to appear on both sides; they became thicker and thicker; and the earth swelled up into banks, and mad into valleys, where there were primroses in the early spring and daisies and cowslips in summer time on.—But even the hollows could scarcely be traced, for the snow had drifted much; right and left, thousands of pines, which would make a twilight even in summer noon, were now almost shrouded with darkness, except where an occasional gap or crevice in the branches made the white ground yellow with moon gold. Here and there a larch spread out its white feathered arms; and occasionally, a leafless oak might be seen sturdy in its winter nakedness, and moaning dismally to the wind. On passed the carriage and still the pines clustered thicker, and (except in the very road) the shades grew deeper; and there was that solemn sound which is made by the crushing and roaring of a hundred thousand branches.

"What is Erick looking at?" asked the baroness; for the box was so low that its occupier might be seen from the front windows of the carriage.

"I cannot tell," replied her husband; but he must have good eyes if he can make out anything."

"Hark! what was that?" cried his wife, as a long, low, melancholy howl, different from the wind, and yet like it, was heard for a moment, and then died away.

"It is the wolves," answered the baron; "this cold weather makes them restless."

"There it is again. It is certainly nearer."

"Erick," said his master, letting down the front window, "tell the boys to drive on; we must keep out of the way of the wolves."

"On with you my men!" shouted Erick—and then in a low voice he said, "I doubt whether we can altogether keep out of their way, sir."

"How is that?" asked the baron, alarmed."

"There is a large pack of them, sir, and they are in scent of us, I fear; at least they are much nearer then when I first heard them, ten minutes ago. There they are again. They cannot be more than half a mile off."

"What are we to do?" asked the baron—"I know you, as a Courland man, are more used to these things than I am."

"Why, sir," replied the servant, "if they come up with us, we will take no notice of them except they attack us; may be, as they are timid creatures, the glare of the lamps and the sight of us will keep them off, and in an hour we shall be in. But I would advise you, sir, to draw the bullets from your large pistols, and load with swan shot; it is more to the purpose to wound a good many than to kill one or two."

"O, papa," cried Helena, as the baron took his pistols from the top of the carriage, what shall we do?"

"We shall do what we can, my dear child, for ourselves, and God will do the rest for us. There is no great danger in these wolves except in the very depth of winter, and if there were, He who delivered David from the paw of the lion and the paw of the bear, and Benaiah from a lion, in the time of snow, as this is, and Daniel from the seven hungry lions, can deliver us also."

"Now," said mother, "now, my love, is the time to see whether we have faith in God, or not. It is easy enough to trust in Him when everything seems safe and comfortable around us; but, when we feel our weakness, then is the time to believe in his power."

"They are coming, sir," said Erick.

The baron looked; and, about a hundred yards back, to the right, in the wood, he could just mark out a grey mass, moving through the trees, and leaping out into the carriage track. They did not howl but baying fearfully; and as they trotted swiftly along, you might hear the shuffling and rustling of the snow under their feet. They moved steadily, and altogether; but were evidently gaining on the carriage. The post-boys plied both their whip and spur; and the horses themselves, in agony of fear, broke out into a canter, in spite of the heavy snow.

"Do you think there is danger, my dear husband?" asked the baroness.

"I cannot tell," said her husband. They do not seem disposed to attack us yet; but they are certainly savage. It is for the horses we have to fear first."

"Are they gaining upon us?"

"A little; but they are not putting out their speed; they could be up with us in a moment if they liked."

Thus the carriage flew along for about five minutes; Erick never took his eyes of the pack, and then the baron thrusting himself out from the left-hand window, watched them as carefully.

"Are your pistols loaded, sir?" asked Erick.

"All—with swan shot."

"With shot; no we shall do."

The pack was now no more than ten yards from the carriage, there might be about two hundred in it. On they came; ears pricked up, eyes glaring and bloodshot, tails stretched straight out, tongues hanging down. At their head ran an old, strong, grey wolf, the leader of the pack. They all came nearer, nearer, nearer still; at last, with a ferocious howl, the leader sprang on one of the wheel horses, and at the same time received a bullet through his head from Erick, who was prepared for him.

"Now, sir," said he, "if you will let me have a piece of string, we may be able to make something of it."

"A piece of string?" cried his master; "you have it in; but what still will it serve?"

"Why, sir, you see wolves, like cowardly creatures, as they are, are always suspecting a trap, and will just tie enough to this string and let it drag behind the carriage. It will keep them off, I dare say, ten minutes."

Erick was right; the stick was dragged along at the distance of about ten yards, and for some time the pack kept behind it, and were plainly afraid of it. At last they began to grow bolder, seemed to have discovered the trick, passed it, and were again making up to the carriage.

"They will be upon us in a moment," cried Erick; "listen, they come; I am ready to fire on them from my side, unless you will from the other."

"Very well," replied the baron.

Helena sat with her head in her mother's, looking up to her face, and seeming to gain comfort from that. Her mother's face was sad, but very calm; she was evidently praying, and thinking more of her child than herself, and yet still more than either, of the mercy and power of God.

"Now, sir," cried Erick.

Master and servant fired at the same moment; there was a savage yell from the foremost in the pack, and three or four fell.

"Load again, sir," cried Erick; "if this lasts you will want all your pistols soon.

After they had fired, once or twice, the wolves were no longer frightened by the report and flash; and they began to surround the coach on all sides.

"There is but one thing left," said Erick; we must cut the traces of one of the leaders, and turn him off; that will divert them for a little while." And turning to the foremost post-boy, he ordered him to cut the traces of his off horse. The man obeyed; the terrified animal started to the right, into the forest, and with a loud yell, the whole pack rushed after him.

"Thank God for that," cried the baroness, "then we may be saved after all."

"Aye, madam, if He please, replied the servant, but this relief will not last long, and they will be on us again."

"How far do you imagine that we are from the post-house now?" inquired the baron.

"Some half-hour," answered Erick; but they will chase us up to the very doors. I never knew them more fierce. Hark! they have got him."

As he spoke there came a scream, or rather shriek, as of a person in agony, far from the right; a shriek so horrible in its sound, that once heard, could never be forgotten. Helena, and her mother both exclaimed "what can that be."

"It is the poor horse," replied the baron; they are tearing him to pieces. A horse's shriek is the most horrible of all horrible things."

"Drive on, my men, for your lives."—shouted Erick. "They will be back presently."

The snow became deeper, and the road worse; and three horses, worn with fatigue, ill supplied the place of four fresh ones. On the right hand the wood thinned a little, opening a kind of a glade, in the centre of which was a frozen pond. As the travellers passed it, the pack of wolves appeared dashing up the valley, baying as they had done at first; only now the jaws and heads of many were stooped in blood.

"We must be near the post-house now," said Erick, "or they will be too much for us; but we must take care what we are about. You and I, sir, will fire at once; and then you, Peter" he added, addressing the foremost post boy, jump down, and leap up here by me."

This was done and the pack were again drawn off. The remaining pair of horses strained their utmost, and all the travellers listened for any sign of the re-appearance of their enemies. The baron spoke twice to Erick, but received no answer; he seemed quite taken up by his own thoughts. At length, the carriage reached the top of the hill; and, at the distance of apparently two miles before it, a clear steady light was to be seen.

"Now then, sir, I believe you are safe." As he spoke, the pack again was heard in the distance; and though the post-light grew larger and brighter every moment, every moment the wolves gained on them, and in a few minutes surrounded them.

"It must come at last, my dear master," said Erick. "I have served you and your father these twenty years, but I never did you better service than I now intend to do. If we all remain together, we shall be all torn to pieces; I will get down, and with my pistols, I shall, I trust, be able to keep them at bay a few minutes. You press on with all speed; leave me here. I know you will take care of my wife and child."

"No Erick," said the baroness; "we will not allow this. We will all be saved, or all perish together. I could not bear to escape at the price of your blood."

"No, indeed," said Helena.

The baron looked at his wife and child, and said nothing.

"Besides, I will try to climb a tree,"—said Erick; "may be they will give me time. But if I delay a moment longer, we shall be all lost together."

"God bless you, Erick," cried his master; "God bless you—and He will bless you. If you perish, I will look to your wife as a mster, and bring up your child as one of my own."

"Thank you, sir," said Erick, firmly.—Now God be with you all. Fire, sir, two pistols at once!" And while the baron fired [illegible] horses; the pack terrified by the sound still and bayed. Almost immediately the travellers heard the report of a pistol; in a minute after two close together; but they heard no more.

And now they are within a hundred yards of the strong, log built inn; the pack is close behind them; the post-boy cracks the whip; the baron fires; the whole party shout, and, as the carriage dashes up to the door, it opens, and a fresh blaze of light is poured into the road. The wolves turn; and the baron and his family are in safety.

Of Erick no trace was ever found. His pistols were discovered next morning where he had been left; three discharged, one still loaded. It is supposed that he had no other to fire before he was pulled down. I need not tell you how nobly the baron fulfilled his promise to his wife and child.

On the same spot now stands a cross, bearing on both sides of its pedestal the name and story of Erick; on the other the legend —"Greater love hath no man than this:—that a man lay down his life for a friend."

And now what are you to learn from this story? What but this. If there have been found those who are willing for their friends' sake, to give up the dearest thing they had, even their life, will you be ashamed at your schoolmates in being unwilling to give up the smallest trifle for those you love? It is all very well to read of the triumphs of the cross; but when will you show them?—Not while you seek your own pleasure, not while you do your own will, not while self is uppermost in everything you take in hand. Then, if you consider, you will show your remembrance of a greater love than that of Erick; the one endured even to death for benefactors and friends, the other for offenders and enemies.

CAPE RACE.

Cape Race, where the steamship Hungarian was lost, leaving no one to tell the sad tale of the disaster, is one of the most dangerous head-lands on the coast, and many a gallant ship has there found a watery grave. Could the stories which mariners have told of the hair-breadth escapes from this headland, be collected, they would fill a volume. In connection with the mysterious disaster which has overwhelmed the steamer Hungarian, the following graphic and beautiful passage from Everett's address at the inugration of the Dudley Observatory, has a peculiar and almost prophetic interest:

"That no further improvement is desirable in the means and methods of ascertaining the ship's place at sea, no one, I think, will from experience be disposed to assert. The last time I crossed the Atlantic, I walked the quarter deck with the officer in charge of the noble vessel on one occasion when we were driving along before a leading breeze and under a head of steam beneath a starless sky, at midnight, at the rate certainly of ten or twelve miles an hour. There is something sublime, but approaching the terrible in such a scene; the ruthless gloom—the midnight chill—the awful swell of the deep—the dismal moan of the wind through the rigging—the all volcanic fires within the hold of the ship—I scarce know an occasion in ordinary life, in which a reflecting mind feels more heavily its hapeless dependence on irrational forces beyond its own control.

I asked my companion how nearly he could determine the ship's place at sea under favorable circumstances; theoretically he answered, I think within a mile; practically and usually, within three or four.—My next question was: how near do you think we may be to Cape Race, that dangerous headland which pushes its iron-bound unlighted bastions from the shores of Newfoundland far into the Atlantic—the first land-fall to the homeward bound American vessel. We must, he said, by our last observations and reckoning, be within three or four miles of Cape Race. A comparison of these two remarks, under the circumstances in which we were placed at the moment, brought my mind to the conclusion that it is greatly to be wished that ... should be discovered of finding the ship's place more accurately, or that navigators would give Cape Race a wider berth."

The distance of Cape Race from Halifax would appear to make it possible, by proper precaution, to avoid it under any circumstances, but it requires the close vance of rules for looking out which are not to be trifled with. A correspondent gives the following account of a narrow escape of one of the Cunard steamships, several years since, in which he was passenger:—

"Mr. Everett's description of the observations, the night at sea, the dangers of approach to Cape Race, bring forcibly to my mind the following circumstances:—In 1848, on board one of the regular steamers we found a pleasant party of friends, and an acquaintance who was intemperate, but with manners good, even in his cups.

As we left Halifax, a German asked our captain when we should reach Cape Race; and further, if there was not some difficulty on account of the variation of the currents. The captain replied ... in an indifferent manner, which naturally is the way most of the foolish questions are answered, "Yes there is sometimes a difference of about 20 miles, from the change of the currents. We shall get to Cape Race to-morrow night at about 10 o'clock." The manner of putting the question, evidently in fear, and the manner of answering so grave a question with indifference, struck me in contrast, and I began to calculate that a ship going ten miles an hour, if the current varied twenty miles, might reach Cape Race at eight o'clock instead of ten. I determined to be on the look-out and the weather being somewhat misty on the next day, (Sunday,) made me more anxious.

At eight o'clock approached, I was talking to a lady of fears and courage at sea, particularly of presence of mind, when I heard screamed in a most alarming manner, "Hard-a-port." What's that—may I go on deck?" "Get your shawl," was said in a second. and I was on deck with Cape Race eighty feet above our heads. The captain, one of the most noble of them all, (since dead) it seems left the wheel house to light a cigar, and was held in one of the ... by two passengers, when ... deck, discovered land, and gave the alarm, but not before as the captain acknowledged, we were within three lengths of the ship's—though the passengers and within a half length of the ship—from chaos.

A kind Providence saved us; but the engineer remarked to me—it will not be long before some vessel will leave her skeleton on Cape Race, for the want of a proper look-out."

Night—How grandly impressive is the stillness of midnight, where millions of suns shower beauty on the sleeping earth in silence. In such an hour a thinking mind must commune with itself, with nature and with heaven. Long past up thoughts rush out—fresh comings-up with the past, the present, and the future occupy them. And divinity is there, felt and acknowledged, above, within, and around us, and the quickest pulse of nature seems emblematic of an eternal rest beyond the tomb.

Little drops of rain brighten the meadows, and little acts of kindness brighten the world.

Those who write, talk and think so much about vice and virtue, that they leave us time to practise either the one or the other.

THE LAST DISCOVERY IN FASHION.

THE CORONATION MAID.

The Duchess of Sutherland who is the partly Niece d'Exeter of England, has openly avowed to whom her favor as a beauty is owing. It is not to cosmetics, nor hair-dyes, nor to milk-baths, or medicated soaps; she repudiates the perruquier, coiffeur, dentist, and jeweller. The secret is out, and the necromancer is a woman!—It is her combination maid. For the benefit of our fair friends, and in the hope that it may commence a new reign in the fifth avenue, we give the full particulars of how the fat, fair and fifty duchess outrun, in the personality of her general appearance, the loveliest of Britain's boasted aristocracy.—It is all done by a combination of colors. For this purpose the duchess selected, with no such care as a gourmand does his gobt, one of her femmes de chambre who had a remarkable instinct for the harmonious arrangement of colors. She can tone down the rapture of a bridal dress, and enliven the melancholy of a mourning dress. The combination maid shows that colors like words have their grammar—thus, every toilette for the day is submitted by her; the shawl is contrasted with the gown; the bonnet is made to suit with both. The wreath of flowers is to be in keeping with the rich bodice, the bodice with the sweeping train; the rich jewellery, taken from a casket almost unparalleled among the subjects of a country, must not eclipse, but heighten the tints of the dress. The whole is placed for inspection, as an artist dresses up a lay figure, and the repute of the maid is staked on the result.

White was that gorgeous lady's favorite attire; white scarce paler than the face, "Oh, call it pale, not fair;" which "combines" with every hue, ornament or flower; but the loveliness may now have fled before the approach of time, and rich colors have been selected as the appropriate tints for the middle age which is so beautiful in England's women. We soon trust to hear that every fashionable lady has her combination maid, and then we shall not be shocked by the appearance of ladies in Broadway in shoes thin enough for a ballroom, and dressed in satins when they go out for a morning shopping.

AN EXTRAORDINARY LIFE.

DEATH OF A CENTENARIAN.

Mrs. McCabe, a resident of the Thirteenth Ward in this city, died on Saturday, at the extraordinary age of one hundred and six years. She was a native of Ireland, and the mother of Alexander McCabe, a well-known leather dealer in this city. Mrs. McCabe was born in 1756, which was one year before Braddock's celebrated defeat at Fort Duquesne. She was fifteen years old when Napoleon I. was born. She had attained the age of twenty-two years when the Declaration of American Independence was made. If President Monroe or Marquis Lafayette were living, they would be several years her juniors. She was older than Alexander Hamilton, and approximates very nearly the age of Thomas Jefferson, who was born 1743. Mrs. McCabe was old enough to remember the taking of Quebec by General Wolfe, in 1759. She was verging on middle age when the American Revolutionary War closed. The memorable exploits of Frederick the Great of Prussia, had not been performed when Mrs. McCabe was born. When the first white man came to Kentucky she was fifteen years old. She was born a subject of King George II. Since that time there have been three Kings and one Queen on the English throne, one of whom reigned sixty years.

The population of the United States when she was born did not amount to more than a million and a half. She has seen it increase to over thirty millions. We are soon to elect the Sixteenth President of the United States. Mrs. McCabe was thirty-five years old before such an office existed. She was born before William Pitt became Prime Minister of England, and before Maria Theresa became Empress of Austria. Two such lives as Mrs. McCabe's almost carry us back to the day when the Pilgrims landed on Plymouth Rock; and three and a half of them reach over a lapse of time that extends to the day that America was discovered by Christopher Columbus.—Cincinnatti Enquirer, Feb. 28th.

The Livingstone Expedition.

From the Zambesi expedition intelligence has been received by Her Majesty's steamer Lynx, to a late date in December. Dr. Livingstone and his party were then at Kongone harbor on the Zambesi delta, and with the aid of the engineers of the Lynx, were engaged in repairing their steam launch the Ma Robert, the iron plates of which have now been worn the thinness of a wafer. They had returned from a second expedition up the Shire, in which they penetrated far up beyond Lake Shirwa to Lake Nyasa. The former they ascertained to be a sheet of water ninety miles in length; while the latter is of still larger magnitude, and one of the chains of lakes of which the discoveries of Captains Burton and Speke are the continuation northward.

Dr. Livingstone speaks in glowing terms of the country which he traversed, and he has applied to the Church Missionary Society in London to exert themselves to occupy it as a most inviting mission field.—Mr. Baines, the artist of the expedition, has been compelled from failing health to come down in the Lynx to the Cape, but purposes returning again to the Zambesi before long. Mr. Thornton, the geologist, had proceeded in July last to the interior, on an independent expedition of his own, in company with some Portuguese traders.—And when the Lynx left the Kongone, Dr. Livingstone, with his brother, Dr. Kirk, and Mr. Rae, were to return to Tete with the Ma Robert, and thence overland by foot on a visit to the Makololo country. This journey was expected to extend over a period of at least eight months.

The following is Dr. Livingstone's letter and confirms all the statements already made of the vast cotton region in central Africa. The Doctor's letter is dated, "River Shire, Oct. 10, 1859," says:—

"We met a large cast slaving party here, coming from Casembe's country, with an immense number of slaves and elephant tusks. We bought some fine specimens of malachite from them. A more blackguard-looking set I never saw; they appear to be the people of the Angoin river, but were not Arabs, though somewhat like them.—When they knew we were English they slipped off at night, with probably the same opinion of us we had of them. The English name is well known far into the country. An English establishment in this quarter would be of great benefit, for the native traders would rather part with their ivory here than carry it a month further to the coast for the same prices. It would soon develope the cotton trade, for the people around are great agriculturalists, and have no cattle, like the Kaffirs. They are quick of apprehension, and we found that suspicions of our turning out to be a marauding party were quickly allayed by frankly stating that we came to find out and mark paths for our traders to come along and buy cotton. Some of the natives ran off at once to find the cotton for sale. But time would be required to get a firm footing in the country. At present not more than one-fifth of the soil capable of cultivation has been under the hoe. A colony of our own honest poor would be a great advantage to both England and Africa; and, were our religious as well as mercantile establishments planted simultaneously, I have no fear as to the result. I have submitted a plan to government by which I think this new field may be occupied advantageously, and a command of a large portion of the east coast slave market obtained. This is the work which I proposed to myself when the expedition was planned.

"In a subsequent letter, addressed to Sir Roderick Murchison, dated November the 5th, Doctor Livingstone describes another mountainous and healthful region parallel to the Shire, lying to the east of the Lakes Shirwa and Tamandua and Nyassa, and which, like Mount Zomba, rises to 7,000 8,000 feet in height. In concluding this letter, he says:—"Develope lawful trades, including the cotton trade, in this fully and healthy country, and slavery is doomed over a very large district. In another letter to the same friend, dated at Kongone, the port at one of the mouths of the Zambesi, which the British expedition discovered, Dr. Livingstone writes, on the 10th of December, in good spirits, his vessel having been rendered water-tight through the assistance afforded him by Captain Berkeley, of Her Majesty's ship Lynx. After expressing his great obligation to Admiral Sir F. Grey, and the naval officers for their friendly aid, he add, "We are in the spot where the sea breeze stays continually upon us, and we enjoy good health. I go up to Markololo country from this."

In giving a description of the great Shire Valley, and of the different kinds of cotton, another letter goes on to say,—the cotton is of two kinds, native and foreign. The native is short in the staple, and feels more like wool than cotton. The foreign appears to be of good quality, with a staple from three-fourth inch to an inch in length. It is perennial, and requires plating only once in three years, while the native has to be planted annually in the highlands, yet, the people prefer the latter, because, they say, it makes the stronger cloth. We remarked to a number of intelligent-looking men in one village, "You should plant plenty of cotton, and perhaps the English will come soon and buy it." "Truly! the country is full of cotton," replied one elderly man, who was a trader, and had travelled much; and our own observations confirmed the truth of this. Everywhere we saw it while passing through two and a half degrees of latitude, and it probably extends much further. Every family appears to have a piece of cotton ground, and it was gratifying to see how clear of weeds and grass they kept them. We saw cotton patches of from two to three acres each, though this time on a different route, we did not observe any containing more than one-third of an acre.—They were in general about a quarter of an acre each. In every village we met, men busy cleaning, carding and spinning cotton—and all the processes are exceedingly slow.

"This vast cotton region is easily accessible. The Shire joins the Zambesi about one hundred miles from the sea, below the difficult parts of the latter river; and for one hundred and twelve miles the Shire has a deep channel, the river being from two hundred yards wide. One hundred and twelve miles from its mouth the cataracts commence (lat. 15° 55' S.) and for thirty miles the river is not navigable (goods would have to be carried overland here) above the cataracts to the Lake Nyasa; sixty miles the river is again navigable, and how far to the north the great navigable lake extends we do not know. The natives said that it would take months to get to the head of the lake.

PROPERTY QUALIFICATION.

A majority of two in the Lower House have decided that the force of enacting, or proceeding to enact, a property qualification from members of Parliament shall be continued. And we are sorry to see in the majority two or three Upper Canada Reformers from whom better things might have been expected.

As a test of moral, as distinct from political courage, the retaining of £500, invested in real estate, is worthless. A man enters the legislature, not as the embodiment of £500, but as the exponent of the congregated industry, intelligence, and wealth of a constituency; and the voters who elect him should be the sole judges of his qualification.

If they prefer one whose head is empty, but whose pocket is full—who is mental calibre is two degrees removed from the flat Berkshire hit his style, but nevertheless owns broad acres, and mortgages not a few—by all means let them have him. On the other hand, if they desire to combine the furtherance of their political concerns to a man endowed with a capacity for usefulness, but who had not the good fortune to be born with a silver spoon in his mouth, should they be debarred by a law borrowed from a barbarous age, and from a country which has itself repudiated the absurdity?

For that the idea of a property qualification, as now acted upon, is other than an absurdity, can any man doubt who glances at the list of members in session at Quebec. How many of the Upper Canada representatives are at this moment solvent? What proportion honestly and really possesses the qualification attributed to them by law? We believe that not more than half are in this position. The other half sit and speak and vote without any bona fide property qualification. To all intents and purposes so far as that requirement of the law is concerned, they hold their positions fraudulently. Practically, then, the law is of no avail. It does not exclude the bankrupt, who is prepared to avail himself of a quibble; whilst it debars from entering public life the honorable and capable man who will not stop to the meanness of a lie, or the guilt of perjury, that he may be able to add M. P. P. to his name.—Hamilton Times

The Paper Duty.

What a great blessing to the people of Britain will be the abolition of the duty on paper, as Mr. GLADSTONE proposes in his Budget. It will give an impetus to the publication of general literature, the benefits of which to the country will be more than equivalent, even pecuniarily, to the amount of duty removed. The saving to the publisher will be immense; the present duty is equal to 1½d per lb., or nearly a fourth of the whole value of the article, consequently in the case of a journal consuming 10,000 lbs. of paper per week, the saving will be £60 or £3,000 per annum. All of this cannot remain to the credit of the publisher; he must reduce the price of his publication proportionately, or increase its value to prevent successful rivalry. Already every city in Britain has its penny papers for the people, and the circulation of some of these is almost incredible. It is obvious then that the people will be largely benefitted by the reduction, and that the poorer classes who are unable to subscribe for the higher class of publications will now receive the benefits of the improvements in the cheaper class.

Books will also undergo a reduction of 10 to 15 per cent., and stores of knowledge will be placed within the reach of many to whom they were formerly denied. The demand for the great "vehicle of thought" will greatly increase, and in this way the country will be ultimately benefitted. The same wise foresight which taught British statesmen that the removal of the window duty would greatly conduce to the sanitary condition of the populace, by causing their dwellings to assume a more cheerful look, and that by removing the duty on soap more cleanliness would be result, the health of the people thereby promoted, and the nation relieved of an army of hospital invalids and work-house inmates—taught them that the modification of the stamp duty would encourage the reading of useful publications, and that public enlightenment would be a necessary consequence. The grants to Working Men's Associations was another step in the same direction, and the establishing of free public libraries, still another. The abolition of the paper duty is perhaps the greatest of the many reforms, and we are of opinion will be of more benefit than the most liberal franchise bill that Quaker Bright—no disrespect—could wish to secure to the men of his school and the people of Britain generally.

What a contrast presents itself when we reflect on the conduct of Canadian Legislatures for the past three years. The tendency of legislation in this country has been diametrically opposite to that of Father-land; while the British Government has [illegible] for the spread of intelligence and the diffusion of knowledge, and endeavoring to remove the burdens which have prevented its past progress, the Canadian Government has been throwing every possible obstacle in the way of intellectual advancement. This is no rash statement; we challenge any one person after giving the subject due consideration to arrive at any other conclusion. Think of the re-imposing of the postage on newspapers, the tax of 20 per cent. on books (religious works included) the withdrawal of the Mechanic's Institutes' appropriation, and a host of such retrograde movements! What more proof is wanted?

And now what are the signs for the future? Gloomy enough, indeed. The men in power are becoming more obnoxious, and at the same time more arrogant and insolent every day. Upper Canada may pray and petition till it is tired, but unless our French masters are willing to grant our just desires, our pleading will be but in vain. We will be told again by Atty. Gen. CARTIER that we "have been enough." Well do these blatant bullies know that their reign is coming to a close, and we may depend they will lay on the lash while yet they hold the scourge.

QUEBEC, March 26.

The past week has been rather a busy and important one among our Legislators, especially the Upper Canada section.

An important debate arose on the second reading of a Homestead Exemption Bill. This Bill proposes to exempt from seizure and sale Real Estate to the value of from $500 to $1,000. In order to secure exemption the party owning property would require to register the mortgage of exemption, and as the Bill would not be retroactive the property would continue liable for any debts contracted previous to the time of registry. The Bill provides also for a further exemption in personal property than now exists by law.

It is a measure which has not probably been under discussion in the eastern section of Upper Canada. The demand for it comes from the west; a similar law is in operation in thirty-two of the United States, in some of them it has existed for over fifty years and has been found to work well.

The Bill passed the second reading and was referred to a special committee. From the feeling apparent in the House a law on the subject will probably be passed.

An interesting debate arose on the second reading of a Bill for the more effectual prevention of corrupt practices at elections.—The debate was extended to the present unsatisfactory state of the law for the trial of contested elections.

Members now actually sit and vote in the House who owe their seats wholly to some error in drawing out the papers connected with the preliminary proceedings necessary to contest. Others occupy seats for years, as did Fellowes by his own vote; before it can be decided that they have been guilty of fraud and are liable to criminal prosecution. A Lower Canadian member, Mr Bellingham who kept his place during the last two Sessions, has been turned out and his opponent at the election received in his place The three members for Quebec—one of them a sworn adviser of His Excellency—hold their seats by the grossest fraud, they are kept there by Governmental influence. This state of things arises from the fact that by the present law the whole matter is under the influence of the supporters of the Government in the House.—By their influence the Committee on Privileges and Elections are appointed to consist of a majority of three supporters. They then appoint a sub-committee of five, nominally by ballot, but in reality, so arranged as to give a majority of ministerialists—when if the unfortunate individual whose seat is contested be in opposition, his case is readily disposed of. If doubtful he is retained as long as he votes right for the Ministry. The Committee, meantime [illegible] from day to day, without deciding, as in the Quebec case.

It has been announced during the week, that these gentlemen were to be unseated but no decision has been announced yet.

On Wednesday afternoon, a vote of Want of Confidence in Ministers, was moved by the Hon. Mr Foley. After some discussion the debate was adjourned till Thursday, when an amendment expressing confidence was moved by Mr Ouimet, a Lower Canadian; and afterwards an amendment to the amendment, was moved by Mr Laberge, another Lower Canadian opposition. The debate was continued on Friday evening, and concluded at 1 a m., on Saturday morning, when the House adjourned.

In course of the debate, which I will probably notice further when giving the result in my next, Major Campbell, a Lower Canadian member, made a forcible appeal to the hon. Mr Brown, invoking his patriotism, and everything sacred, to induce him to stand aside as being personally disliked by the Lower Canadians, might be able to coalise with the majority of Upper Canada in forming a Government acceptable to a majority of both sections. Mr Brown replied in one of those forcible and withering speeches which he can apply with such force when the necessity arises, and declared if they would agree to form a Government prepared to carry out the principles of the Opposition in justice to Upper Canada, that he was not only willing and ready to resign his position as leader of the Upper Canada Opposition, but to resign his seat and retire at once into private life. He further stated that his resignation was at that moment in the hands of his party. It appears that in consequence of the Lower Canadians being determined to cling to their position of advantages as long as possible, there is little hope of a change of Ministry until after a general election, and this had led certain members from Western Canada, who have usually acted with the Opposition to desire by yielding to the demands of the Lower Canadians to unite with them in breaking up the present Government, and in accepting office. In this, it is said, the great majority of the U. C. Opposition, [illegible] understand they have determined to stand boldly for the rights of Upper Canada, and look to the people at the next elections for the remedy.

The debate which will probably arise on the resolutions adopted by the Convention at Toronto, in November last, and to be moved in the House by Mr Brown, will bring prominently before the country these issues which will be decided at the next general election.

An impression obtains that the present session will be short, and that it will probably adjourn over to meet again at the time the Prince of Wales shall visit Canada in June next.

The Hon. Post Master General, Hon. Atty. General West, and Thos. Short, Esq., M.P.P., will please accept our thanks for important Parliamentary documents.

☞ We would call the attention of Farmers and others, to the advertisement in our columns of a Crop Grinder, patented by Mr. Alden Mowry, of Ashburnham.—We have been shown certificates from the best judges of Agricultural implements in the county, stating that Mr. Mowry's machine is ahead of anything of the kind in use.

The Ballot System.

We are glad to see this subject taken up by so many of our contemporaries and we hope that it will not be long ere a progressive point for discussion. Meanwhile we will carefully watch the working of the system in Australia and elsewhere. In an exchange we find that the Rev. Thomas Binney, who has lately returned from Australia, in a letter to the Vice-president of the Ballot society, bears testimony to the efficient working of the ballot in that colony. He says that on his arrival in the colony, in 1856, all with whom he came in contact, ministers of religion especially, expressed themselves as alike gratified and surprised by the result which had taken place under some new experiment, including, if his expressions are correct, an extension of the suffrage, and employment of the ballot. He was at Sydney at the time of the general election last year, and so far as the working of the ballot was concerned, nothing could be more satisfactory. There was no disorder, excitement, or intemperance, everything passed off with the utmost decorum; and with respect to the working of the measure generally, he does not remember to have heard anything of dissatisfaction or complaint.

☞ By direction of the Post Master General, all Post-offices may hereafter be closed on Sunday. It is still optional with the Post-masters whether they will do so, but we are convinced that 19-20ths of them will at once take advantage of this offer.

TO LET.—Our jail is to let, and we hope it may remain so. At the Assizes last week Dogherty, who broke into the store of Messrs. McKellar & Cameron, plead guilty, and was sentenced to serve 5 years in the Provincial Penitentiary. In the Starks vs. Armitage seduction case, the jury returned a verdict for plaintiff, $5 damages. The Court closed on Thursday at noon.

☞ No meeting of the Council during the past week. We are informed that Mr O'Beirne's Mayor has returned from his mission, but what success he had in Port Hope deponent saith not. The Council meets on Monday night next, when Mr Morrow will probably tell us all that he has not forgotten about his treaty with Mr Quinlan, and the Port Hope Council.

☞ The Review in speaking of the recent newspaper changes in Port Hope and Millbrook, says:—

"Roger was too independent and outspoken for the little cliquedom that curses Port Hope, and that has, up to this time, prevented the success of an independent paper in that Town."

What brazen impudence for a paper that has ever since the first day of its existence been upheld by, and basin return upheld "the little cliquedom" that curses the Town of Peterboro'.

The wretched servility of papers of the Review stamp has prevented the success of outspoken and independent journals, not in Port Hope alone, but in every town in the Province. Yet this contemptable sycophant, forsooth, prates about the ill-success of independent journals. Had the Review shown the independence of a sparrow in dealing with men and things, since the commencement of his career here, he would not now be feeding so freely on ill-gotten gain.

FATAL ACCIDENT.

It becomes our painful duty to record a melancholy accident by which a young man, 23 years of age, named Angus Gillis—brother to Mr. Allan Gillis, of this town—lost his life in Mariposa, on Saturday, the 10th inst. The unfortunate young man was engaged with one of his brothers in chopping, and as they were standing near some trees which had lodged, a sudden gust of wind blew one of them from its resting place, and it fell directly upon deceased, causing instantaneous death.—Lindsay Advocate.

FIRE AND LOSS OF LIFE.

We have been informed of a melancholy case of loss of life by fire, which happened in the Township of Ops on Friday last. On that day a man named John Murray went from his house to a sugar-bush, a short distance in the woods, leaving his wife at home, with directions to put their child, an infant of four months old, to sleep, and to follow him into the bush. She did so, and after a while the father, noticing a great deal of smoke in the direction of their house, asked his wife if she had left a large fire, to which she replied that she had. As, however, the smoke increased, Mr. Murray became alarmed and hurried home, when his consternation may be imagined, upon finding the whole interior of the house on fire, and his little child burned to death. It is not known how the accident occurred.—Lindsay Advocate.

SOLUTION TO PROBLEM No. 6.

Let X = the number of Sheep,
Z = the number of Pigs,
X plus Y, plus Z, = 100,
10 X plus 3 Y, plus Z2 = 100,
20 X plus 20 Y, plus 20 Z=2000,
14 Y plus 19 Z = 1890,
Y = 14 plus 1786—19 Z = 1

14

Z = 1786 divided by 19—94.
X then = 5.

Therefore he bought 94 pigs, 1 sheep, 5 cows.

TO THE RIGHT REV. W. H. POOLE, &c., &c.

Rev. and Dear Sir,—

A production lies before me bearing your signature, headed "Extravagant Expenditure in Toronto."

It gives me the greatest pleasure to find you at the 11th hour becoming a Clear Grit. I, sir, shall lend you my feeble aid in curtailing all unnecessary and extravagant expenditure in every department in which the people of Canada are interested. I hope you are honest and sincere in your desire for retrenchment. If so, if so, you will have the co-operation and support of all good and right minded men, also the sustaining influence of the public press. Rev. Sir, If I am not mistaken, the fable of the Wolf and the Lamb, will apply to your virtuous indignation, regarding the Toronto University.

When did you become a convert to Reform principles? Is it since you became the hired help of Victoria College? and perhaps Judas-like carries the bag, which if empty requires to be filled at the sacrifice of our national institutions. It is money you want, sir, and not retrenchment and reform!

Sir, preparatory schools are required to enable our young men to enter Colleges. That would not suit your reverence. To give the Grammar Schools of Peterboro', Lindsay, Norwood, Keene, Omemee, &c., aid from the spare funds of the Toronto University, and likewise to all the counties in Canada West. Apply funds to the noble and patriotic object of educating our youth as it were under the paternal roof and watchful eye of a parents love until their young and tender minds are matured to such a degree that neither the blandishments of an alluring world, nor the false systems of perverted truth, shall be able to turn them from the narrow path in which our Creator, God, directed the Patriarchs of old to train their children from the early dawn until the going down of the sun; amidst the busy scenes of pastoral life, teaching and preparing them to be good, that they might become great.

Sir, there is a wide scope for your able pen in reforming peculation; overhaul your bosom friend and colleague. Ask him all the particulars in regard to the Ten Thousand Dollar job. Examine the expenditure of this worthy chief. "Shoulder the broom," tuck up your long robes, overhaul, overhaul, examine and see that the beam is not in your own eye, before you denounce Presbyterians, Episcopalians, Baptists, Episcopal Methodists, N. C. Methodists, Bible Christians, Independents, Congregationalists, Quakers, Shakers, Mormonites, &c., &c. What presumption! By what authority, do you bring your superiors in numbers, intelligence, wealth, and antiquity, under your anathema. The Canadian press also comes in for their share of abuse. The Witness, Leader, Globe, Examiner, Times, Canadian Statesman and other able independent journals, are all subjects of your false and undignified remarks.

Now, sir, I ask, who are you? A fire brand, a busy body. Yes, a man that will mis-state facts to carry out his own selfish ends! I think, sir, your proper name must be Mr. By-Ends; your history and conduct agrees with Bunyan's representation of that amiable gentleman. Dear brother, repent, or your reward will at last be according to your works.

You sowed dragon's teeth in Peterboro' where you resided but too long for the harmony of the Christian church. Peace, has been proclaimed—[illegible] "The tree is known by its fruits." "Men do not gather grapes from thorns, nor figs from thistles." I will ask ask you one or two more questions. How many thousand dollars do your co-religionists receive from the numerous bodies of Christians I have named above? What returns are they receiving for their kind support to your Methodical system? Destroy—destroy! Des roy their halls of learning, Bible and Tract societies, &c., &c. "Woe be unto ye hypocrites," &c.

I remain,
awaiting your reply,
FATHER HONESTY.

Peterboro', March 22, 1860.

P. S:—Mr. Editor: It will become really necessary on the part of the Protestant community to correct the false impressions that are being made through the agency and influence of the clerical part of the Methodist Church. What are they doing do you think? Why they are trying to get the unthinking and careless portion of the community to cut their own throats by signing their petitions to the Legislature of United Canada now assembled. I hope there is honesty and patriotism enough in our Legislative halls, not only to put a stop to this system of vandalism, but to take the $3,000 they now receive, and throw them, and all sectarian institutions on their own resources, and as in duty bound they will have the confidence of the people of Canada.

MOUNT HOPE TRIPOLI.

To the Editor of the Globe.

SIR,—In your paper of to-day I notice an extract from the Port Hope Guide on the above subject, containing the following passage: "We are assured that the Tripoli has been submitted to the best chemists in the province, and after a careful examination has been pronounced a genuine article."

I do not know what others may have done, but for myself most most distinctly deny having ever certified that the so-called Mount Hope Tripoli [illegible]

A SURVEYING PARTY ATTACKED BY SCURVY.

A distressing affair recently took place in the unsurveyed country at the back of the county of Victoria. Last week news was brought into Lindsay to the effect that the surveying party of Mr. Brady had been seized with scurvy which carried off a young man, about seventeen years of age, named Roche, nephew to G. M. Roche, Esq., Crown Agent, Lindsay. This turned out to be too true. The deceased died a month previous. A shell was made for the body, which was buried in the snow to preserve it until it could be brought into Lindsay. It is expected here in about two weeks. Of the party who came in from the Surveyor's Camp, two were badly afflicted with the scurvy, and were scarcely expected to survive. Mr. Brady was the most remote Surveyor, and was engaged beyond Bell's Line. It took the party who came out a month to reach Fenelon Falls. This is the second of the family who has lost his life upon this survey.—Lindsay Herald.

Two young men in Normandy died recently of internal ulcers, caused by tobacco smoking.

ELECTIONS IN LOMBARDY.

MILAN, March 2.

The elections are fixed for the 25th inst., and Parliament is convoked for the 2nd of April. One can scarcely overrate the importance of these two facts, which leave at any rate, no doubt about the resolution of Piedmont to pursue the road once chosen. By a curious coincidence, M. Thouvenel's note of the 31st of January, proposing the same solution, appeared the same day in the papers, adding thus, as it were, the sanction of France to the resolution of Piedmont.—It must, however, be recollected that a month has passed since that note was written, and that at the end of that note the readiness of France is expressed to listen to any modifications and combinations which might lead to a less radical solution.

It is the proposal of a new and less radical combination of this kind which has thrown lately a cloud over the political sky of Italy; the traces of it are visible in the dark passages of the Emperor's speech, where it is said that he counseled the King of Sardinia to respond favourably to the wishes of the provinces which have offered themselves to him, but to maintain the autonomy of Tuscany and to respect in principle the rights of the Holy See.

Although people might have been prepared for something unpleasant, this dark passage has caused wry faces. "What does it mean?" every one asks himself.—Autonomy for Tuscany, and a species of feudal vassalage of the Romagna towards the Pope. The more mistrustful apprehend the reopening of the old game, which every one hoped was concluded.

The decree summoning Tuscany to give, on the 11th and 12th inst., a plebiscite, by universal suffrage and by ballot, for the annexation, or for a separate kingdom, seems to indicate that the latter are right. It is a thunderbolt from a clear sky, unexpected and dazzling. Universal suffrage and vote by ballot are, as I have repeatedly said, in bad odour in Italy, and not unjustly so. The popular movement in Italy, like all really national movements, is carried on by the most intelligent and wealthy classes of the country, while the masses of the lower classes, as more or less, take little active interests in politics, being perhaps more behind in education proportionally than any other country, while they are at the same time, more under the influence of the clergy, a class which is not everywhere so devoted to national interests as its great majority is in Lombardy. Thus the fate of Tuscany is to be specially committed to the insight and penetration of the most ignorant part of the population, whom it will be even difficult to teach what they are expected to vote. Take any peasant in the world and try to give him an idea of a separate kingdom. It is a hard case that ignorance should be appealed to for the solution of a political question.

But it is not so much the result of this plebiscite which renders people anxious, for it is expected to be favorable to the annexation; it is the apprehension of what else may follow after this first stroke.

The Emperor's speech was expected to be favorable to the annexation; it is the apprehension of what else may follow after this first stroke.

The Emperor's speech was expected with no less impatience by the French army in Italy than by the Italians themselves, and certainly the impression produced on the former was not much more satisfactory than that produced on the latter. The only question which was eagerly asked from those [illegible] was, Shall we have war or not?" The dispositions is decidedly bellicose, and Italy is thought a more agreeable garrison than some small town in France. If there is no war, it is felt this Capua must be left, and the only alternative offered in the speech is a garrison at Chambery with plenty of white mice.

Fanti, in company with Cialdini, has gone to Central Italy. The second, as you remember, was spoken of as lieutenant to the Minister of War in Central Italy. His journey, therefore, is interpreted as a tour of inspection on a field where he might soon be called upon to act.

In the midst of this political uncertainty and gunpowder smell, the electioneering movement has begun again with fresh vigor. Almost all the electoral associations and circoli which took part in the communal and provincial elections have returned to new life, and are busy in coming to some understanding about their list of candidates. You hear of nothing but electoral meetings and candidates; every one is full of them. The subject has been so eagerly taken up that it has almost thrown into the background general politics, which is almost incredible in such an interesting moment.

A curious feature in this movement is the absence of individual agitation. In vain would you seek for spontaneous candidates addressing electors or canvassing votes.—Such a step would be the surest means to not being elected. It would pass for personal ambition, which is, with a certain affectation, excluded from this electioneering movement. All are supposed to act from patriotism, and without any consideration for themselves. The initiative comes entirely from the electoral committees. Of programmes there is but little trace, except certain vague expressions which do not much differ from each other. The only point on which all speak out distinctly is that the candidate must pledge himself to promote by all means in his power the annexation of the four provinces of Central Italy. It is needless to remark what a power for decisive action a parliament thus constituted will give to an energetic ministry.

GREAT BRITAIN.

The Duke of Newcastle laid the despatches before Parliament relative to the Savoy question, contained details of everything that had taken place. He admitted however, that certain private letters from Lord Cowley containing nothing of any moment had not been published. Several Peers deprecated the practice of diplomatic correspondence being carried on by private letters.

In the House of Commons, Lord John Russell requested Mr. Kinglake to postpone his motion protesting against the annexation of Savoy to France, on the ground that the discussion now would be prejudicial to the public service. Mr. Kinglake consented, but would introduce it at a subsequent period.

The subject of allowing France to carry out a system of emigration from India to her colonies was brought up and denounced by Mr. DuCane. Lord John Russel reiterated his previous explanation that the arrangement was made with a view of arranging the free emigration system of France, which practically revived all the evils of the slave trade, and under these circumstances he thought the new arrangement perfectly justifiable.

Mr. Byng moved an address to the Crown approving of the new commercial treaty with France, and promising that Parliament will take necessary steps to carry it into effect.

publishes Farini's reply to Cavour's message of the 29th February. He says if the form of the new vote is not decided upon, he should choose universal suffrage. The acts of Rome have destroyed any possibility of a vicarate, as proposed by France over the Romagnas. He guarantees full and absolute liberty in voting.

A despatch from Cavour to Rinnoia, dated 28th of February, communicates the French ideas relating to the settlement of the Central Italian question. Cavour says that the assurances of the French Government show that the election of a Prince of the house of Savoy would be opposed by France. Whatever will be the result of the next vote of Tuscany, the King will accept it before then.

Rinnoia, in a despatch to Cavour dated the 4th of March, denies that Tuscany aspires without reflection to the union with Piedmont. He says everything confirms the opinion that they were right in freeing themselves from Austria.

Paris, Saturday.—The Constitutionnel publishes a semi-official article against the general adoption of universal suffrage as applied to the doctrine of national sovereignty. A false extension of the principle may become an incessant source of trouble and danger to Europe, though an extension is about to take place in Italy in opposition to the counsels given by France.

The Paris correspondent of the Times says it is stated that the bills of excommunication against Victor Emmanuel, are ready to be launched the moment the approbation of the Central Italian States is declared.

Turin, March 8.—The Opinione publishes Count Cavour's despatch of the 2nd, relative to Savoy and Nice. He declares that the aggrandizement of Sardinia can never prove dangerous to France, but that considering the obligations that Sardinia is under to France, serious attention must be given to the Emperor's demands. At the moment when Sardinia demands for the inhabitants of Central Italy the right to dispose of their destiny, she exposes herself to the charge of inconsistency if she denies the right of free expressing their wishes to her subjects dwelling on the other side of the Alps. However great the regret would be at the cradle of the Piedmontese monarchs demanding separation, Sardinia would not refuse to recognize the weight of a manifestation, however slight, if made in conformity with the prescriptions of Parliament.

In regard to the opposition of the great Powers, Cavour thinks that the decree for proper frontiers of France and Sardinia will secure just and equitable negotiations on this head.

A royal decree of Naples establishes modifications on 240 articles of customs tariff, and orders a revision of the remaining articles.

The Tuscan correspondent of the London Times asserts that under certain conditions and with the free consent of the popular will, the Italians would consider themselves well rid of Savoyards.

Telegraphic Despatches.

MEXICAN AFFAIRS.

New Orleans, March 21.

Miramon notified the foreign vessels that he would commence the bombardment of Vera Cruz on the night of the 13th, and he would not be responsible for the shipping anchored under the Castle.

On the 12th the officers on the deck of the General Miramon heard heavy cannonading in the direction of Vera Cruz.

There were captured with the two steamers, six mortars, six 22-pounders, and 2,000 stand of small arms.

The steamers were worth $60,000.—They broke down the third day out and put into Lizal.

The materials of war were stored away below out of the sight of the men, who were ignorant of the destination of the expedition, and who were forced into the service.

Maria's steamers returned the Saratoga's fire and then tried to escape. The Indianola pursued the Miramon, whereupon the latter fired upon her. The Indianola returned the fire and the crew boarded the Miramon at the point of the bayonet. A portion of the Indianola's deck was carried away by the shot. The Miramon was then run aground, and the Saratoga brought the Marquez to.

The Picayune is informed by the French prisoners on board the prizes that the fighting was done principally by the officers, who were stationed on the shores and fired the guns assisted only by Mexican sailors from the shore. The two steamers had 250 men on board, and their killed and wounded amounted to forty.

The Indianola and Wave had 80 men each.

The first engineer of the Marquez, an American, was killed. Capt. Turner asked why he fired upon an American vessel without provocation. Marin replied that his men could not be controlled. He knew the nationality of the Saratoga and understood her signals. The men fired contrary to his orders. Captain Turner replied—"You are entirely responsible for the outrage."

It is stated that the expenditure cost $360,970, mostly furnished in Havana by the Government, in accordance with a secret article of the Almont treaty.

The prize steamer Maryong is anchored opposite this city.

Lieut Chapman has received orders from Washington to remain here, and forward his despatches. He has despatches also for the British Minister.

Juarez's proclamation, declaring Maria's expedition piracy, authorized any one to capture it.

The Delta publishes the details of the negotiations between the British and Mexican Governments. Lord John Russell proposes an arbitration, a general amnesty and religious toleration. If the proposition is declined, England must demand of both parties in Mexico full indemnity for the English subjects.

Miramon has prepared the forces of the republic, and hopes that England, France, Spain, Prussia, and the United States, shall be mediators for the establishment of peace. Meantime, the Custom-house duties are to be divided between the two parties.

Juarez returned Miramon's communication on the 3rd instant, with the declaration that the proposition was absurd and inadmissible.

New York, March 21.

The Tribune's Washington correspondent says, Marion, who was captured with the steamer was formerly Commodore in the old Mexican navy. Our government is possessed of information of all that passed between Marimon and him, and found Mr. McLane's instructions under that knowledge. He had credit for $80,000 in one bill, which was subsequently increased to purchase steamers and munitions either in the United States or Cuba, to co-operate with Marimon, when the attack from land was made against Vera Cruz. He left Havana under the Spanish flag, which was the original colors of the steamers, but hoisted the Mexican flag. His movements were known and watched throughout. The British Minister here was informed of the intention of our Government to disregard any blockade of Marimon attempted at Vera Cruz, and of the extent of Mr. McLane's instructions to that effect, and it is understood acquiesced in the policy, upon the ground that Mexican privateers might be fitted out, to the serious injury of the commerce in the Gulf.

MUTINY AT SEA.

Boston, March 24.—The ship Norway of New York, when five days out on the passage from Macao to Havana, with 1,000 coolies, was the scene of a terrible mutiny, in which 30 coolies were killed and ninety wounded. The fight lasted from six p. m. till daylight next morning, when the coolies yielded. Capt. Major had his wife and two daughters, also a lady passenger and child on board. The lady passenger died of fright and her child expired soon afterwards.

Edward W. Reed, a music teacher, of West Springfield, convicted of adultery, was to-day taken to the house of Correction for two years and a-half.

New York, March 24.—It is reported that A. T. Stewart, the dry goods merchant, has been taken to the insane asylum.

FIFTY-SEVEN PERSONS MURDERED BY PIRATES.

Singapore, Jan. 21.—Her Majesty's steamer Ontrust, when about five days' steaming above Banjermassing, was suddenly attacked by about six hundred men in prahus. The crew had not time to fire more than one shot when the assailants were in possession, and after murdering all on board, (seven officers and fifty men), they ran the vessel aground. In reference to this report a London paper says: "We have made inquiries at the Admiralty, and we find that the prefix "H. M. S." to the vessel must be incorrect. In all probability the vessel lost is in the service of his Netherlands Majesty, if it is a vessel of war. To-day's mail has brought accounts of all the vessels in Her Majesty's service which could have been anywhere in the neighborhood, and there is no report of any such occurrence. The vessel is probably named Ontrust, and was attacked five days steaming from Banjermassing, up the river Banjer in Borneo, which forms part of a Dutch province."

FROM OREGON.

Telegrams from the South part of Oregon, casting in the vicinity of Jacksonville, on account of rich quartz discoveries. One company had taken out $125,000 in gold. 800 pounds of rock yielded $60 in gold.

The steamer Columbia arrived from the southern part of Oregon to-day, bringing news of a horrible massacre of Indians at several villages around Humboldt Bay by a party of forty white men.

At daylight on the 26th, at Indian Island opposite the town of Eureka, and distant therefrom but a few hundred yards, more than 40 Indians were killed, three-fourths of whom were women and children.

On the beach at the south entrance of Humbolt Bay, 40 or 50 more were massacred, that being every human being with a red skin at that village.

It was reported that a simultaneous attack was made the same morning upon the Indian villages on Eel river.

These deeds were perpetrated by the farmers and graziers of Eel river country who have suffered from Indian depredations during the past year.

THE SAN JUAN DIFFICULTY.

Washington, March 26.

Negotiations in regard to the San Juan affair are progressing slowly. The proposition recently submitted to our Government by Great Britain upon a basis which she thought would be acceptable to the United States by yielding our rights to the Island, so fixing the boundary so as to include other portions of Her Majesty's territory which we do not claim, but which are worthless, was replied to, and positively declined. Mr. Branch will oppose the organization of new territories, and moved an amendment to the Utah Bill, giving the President of the United States power to appoint territorial legislatures as the custom prior to 1836. This will set up all difficulties by the root. If the new territories shall be organized, elections for delegates will be ordered. Delegates elected prior to the existence of the territories could not claim seats in the Congress.

THE PIRATE STEAMERS.

Washington, March 26.

New Orleans papers of Wednesday contain a statement made by the prisoners aboard the Mexican prize steamers, corresponding substantially with the accounts already published. The General Miramon had a crew of 250 men, mostly Spaniards; 40 of the crew were killed and wounded in the engagement. The prisoners state that the ammunition was put on board at Havana with the knowledge of the Cuban Government. A large portion of her cargo consisted of powder, which was thrown overboard during the fight.—Some of the barrels of this powder have been recovered, and prove to be the same as used in the arsenals at Havana.

BARNUM HIMSELF AGAIN.

New York, March 24.

P. T. Barnum made a speech here to-night, stating that since his failure, four years ago, he has been engaged in giving exhibitions, and in musical and commercial speculations in Europe, which, with the proceeds of his lectures in great Britain, has enabled him to cancel all his Jerome Clock debts and preserve a large portion of his estate. He announced himself as again the proprietor of the American Museum, and declared in every name "Richard was himself again."

New York, March 26.—John Lothrop Motley, historian of the Dutch Republic, has been elected corresponding member of the French Institute, in place of the late Mr. H. Prescott.

Mr. Mosby one of the commissioners to negotiate a loan of $1,000,000 for the Republic of Bolivia, came passenger in the Baltic.

General Hayne, New Granadine minister to Washington, has been nominated for President of his country and will doubtless be elected in June.

Advices from Ecuador report that Moreno's forces have beaten those of France three skirmishes. Both of the factions were waiting till May for the rains to cease when the contest will be renewed.

PERU.

It is said no attempt has been made to get up a revolution in Arequippa against Castela, but it was put down after three hours fighting.

Advices from New Granada state the Cass-Cerron treaty, as amended by the United States, has been ratified by both Houses of the Granadian Congress.

FIRE IN NIAGARA.

Niagara, March 26.

A fire broke out on Sunday morning, the 25th inst., at about one o'clock, a. m., in the back part of a building on the corner of Queen and Gate-streets, occupied by H. Gibson as a cabinet shop. The wind being very high at the time, the fire raged uncontrolled till seven houses, with outhouses, laid in ashes. The premises were all occupied, and a number of families have been rendered houseless. One building, occupied as the Odd Fellows and Free Mason's lodges, was destroyed with its entire contents. No insurance. The fire was finally arrested by the pulling down of a building by the hook and ladder company, and the exertions of the fire company and citizens generally. Probable loss, $5000; not insured.

PROBABLE MURDER AT SEA.

A DESERTED VESSEL FOUND IN NEW YORK BAY.

From the New York Times.

Early yesterday morning the sloop E. A. Johnson, of Islip, Long Island, was discovered adrift in the Lower Bay, between the east bank and Romer Shoal, by Captain Sistare, of the schooner Telegraph, of New London. Her bowsprit was gone, her sails and rigging were dragging alongside, and there was no one on board. On boarding her, Captain Sistare discovered that her decks, fore and aft, were besmeared with blood, and found human hair, matted with gore, scattered here and there, indicating that a murderous affray had probably taken place. Large pools of blood were found on the floor of the cabin, and table, chairs, and stove were spattered. Everything was confusion and disorder. A large hammer was found on which were found human hair and blood, showing that the murderous work had, in part, been accomplished with that instrument. From the cabin door to the side of the vessel there were marks of blood, apparently indicating that the victims had been drawn from the cabin and thrown into the ocean. A pool of blood was visible near the scuppers, and there were traces of it on the outside of the vessel, and prints of bloody hands on the rail. Pools of blood also surrounded the mast near the windlass, and the red traces of crime were found on the mast and sails. The vessel was taken in charge by the captain of the schooner, and shortly afterwards the the steam-tug Ceres coming along, took both vessels in tow, and brought them to Fulton Market slip. Coroner Schirmer, with his assitant, Dr. Boughton, instituted an investigation. The captain of the sloop was George Burr, of Islip, Long Island, aged about 34 years, and has chartered to go to Virginia for a load of Oysters, and left Spring Street dock on the 15th inst., with a crew of three persons, two of whom were named Smith Watts and Oliver Watts; the name of the third is unknown. The captain, it is stated, had several hundred dollars (some say as much as $2,000) to be used in purchasing his cargo. The sloop called at Keyport, New Jersey, and left there last Sunday. Nothing was seen of her afterwards until yesterday morning about 2 o'clock, when she ran into the schooner. John B. Mather, which was below the the Narrows, on her way to Wilmington, striking her amidships, cutting her down almost to the water's edge, and so badly injuring the schooner as to oblige her to return for repairs. Captain Nickerson, of the schooner, states that it was quite light at the time, and he distinctly saw one man at the helm, and the boat hanging at the davits.

There are various theories concerning this mysterious affair, the most plausible of which is that the unknown person who were in the vessel took the first opportunity, after the vessel got outside of Sandy Hook, to murder the captain and the two young men, and then to put back to the city; and that he was about running the vessel ashore when he came into collision with the schooner.—Captain Weed, of the Second Precinct Police, and Sergeant Phillips have been making inquiries with a view to the detection of the murderers. A messenger went to Islip, last evening, to ascertain all the facts which could there be learned concerning the captain of the ill-fated sloop. It is believed that the person seen on board must have taken the small boat, and landed on the Long Island shore below Coney Island shortly after he ran into the schooner.

HORRIBLE MURDER!

One of the most brutal cases of wife-murder on record occurred in the village of Thornton, on the evening of the 12th inst., committed by a man named Hugh McDonald, a cooper, upon his wife, Margaret McDonald. It appears that McDonald has been in the habit of drinking to excess, and stocked by liquor, would quarrel with, and abuse his wife. On the evening of the murder, he attacked her with more than usual violence, striking her down, and then leaping upon her face and neck. The poor woman never spoke after being struck down.

McDonald has a family of six children, two of whom a boy of seventeen, and a girl of fourteen years old, deposed that their mother was murdered by her husband in the manner above stated. Only a few minutes previous to her death, the murdered woman is said to have been in a neighbor's house, and in a good state of health.

Dr. Norris, Coroner of Cookstown, and a respectable jury, held an inquest upon the body, which, on being examined, displayed marks and bruises of a fearful character.—A verdict of "wilful murder" was returned against Hugh McDonald, who was immediately arrested, and is now in Barrie Jail awaiting his trial.—Barrie Advance.

REV. DR. FYFE.

We regret to learn that the first Baptist Congregation in Toronto are about to lose the services of their esteemed pastor. The Baptist says:—

Resignation of Dr. Fyfe.—At a church meeting held last Friday evening, Dr. Fyfe stated to the church that he had conditionally accepted a call to take the presidentship of the institute at Woodstock, and therefore tendered his resignation, to take effect in three months from that date. He said he had not come to the resolution without a struggle with the feelings, but his conscience of duty left him no other course. He congratulated himself and the church upon the circumstances under which the resignation was given. There was nothing in the church to render the unhappy or restless; he felt the strongest interest in it, and would do his utmost hereafter to secure its welfare. Several gave expression to their regret at the proposed change, and the church agreed to meet the following Wednesday for prayer and consultation. This change will not effect the Dr.'s connexion with the organ of the denomination; but special reference will be made to this subject at some future time.

THINGS NOT TO BE SEEN.

We have the highest authority for stating that H.R.H the Prince of Wales will not be invited to see the following Canadian curiosities:—

1. The Bible used during the Double Shuffle. The article has, we understand, been placed at the disposal of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, and is now doing good service amongst the Bojesmen.

2. The Consolidated Statutes as a sample of cheap Canadian literature.

3. The pen with which the Address of the Reform Association was written. (It is to be sent to the British Museum, and to be followed there some half century hence by its employer as a mummy.)

4. The poll-books of the city of Quebec. They are to be employed as a cushion by the Honourable Mr. Alleyn when he takes his seat on the Bench.

5. The York Roads. Her Majesty has given strict orders that the illustrious neck of the heir apparent shall be jeopardized on them. (In consequence of the Royal determination, Mr. Beaty is about to turn annexationist.)

6. The City Council. The sound education he has received forbids him entering bad company. He has not forgot a line in the Royal copy-book: "Evil communications corrupt good manners."

8. Mr. Gowan's last speech. All nauseous and offensive matter must be carefully kept at a safe distance from the nostrils of the Prince.

9. Mr McGee's 300,000 men. The junior member invited H.R.H. to review them on the Champ de Mars at Montreal; but we hear that the invitation has been peremptorily refused.—Grumbler.

ENTRY OF THE 78TH HIGHLANDERS INTO EDINBURGH.

The 78th Highlanders arrived at Edinburgh on Friday evening, Feb. 24, at half-past five o'clock. The entry, says the Scotsman, was a perfect triumph. At five o'clock, the hour of their expected arrival, approached, the city bells commenced to ring out joyful chimes, and people hurried about to secure good positions along the route from Waverley Bridge station to the Castle. The town was in a state of universal excitement. With one or two exceptions all the city companies of Volunteer Rifles and Artillerymen assembled on parade for the purpose of lining the streets, and the Mid-Lothian Coast Artillery and Leith Rifles were also present to take their share of duty. Upon the Volunteers depended the entire order of procession. The presence of a large police force had been requested with the view of temporarily preserving the streets from traffic, but for some unexplained reason not a dozen constables were visible. An almost unbroken line of volunteer guards stretched from the Bridge up to the Mound. Every window commanding a view of the line of route was occupied, and on the houses top in Princes' street hundred of spectators were assembled. There could not have been less than fifty or sixty thousand persons assembled. On the station platform there was also a considerable number of privileged persons waiting to give the first welcome to the 78th. The Lord Provost and Dean of Guild were in attendance, as representing the city; the Rev. Mr. Miller, chaplain to the garrison, was likewise present, as also were several military and volunteer officers. The bands of the County Militia and Mid-Lothian Coast Artillery were formed within the station, near to the entrance gates, ready to strike up martial music and strains of cordial welcome. The Highlanders arrived at 5 30 p.m., amid deafening cheers within and without the station. The carriage doors were quietly opened, and the "six hundred" were in an instant welcomed to Edinburgh as old familiar friends. Some of them recognized relatives from whom they had been long separated, and the warmth of their greeting was of painful interest. On Col. Ewart's stepping out of his carriage, the Lord Provost advanced and addressed to him a few words of congratulation and welcome to which the gallant Colonel briefly responded, expressing a hope that the 78th Highlanders would always serve their country as devotedly as the hitherto had done in whatever circumstances they were placed. The men seemed remarkably well pleased, and not a little surprised at the warmth of their reception, but it was not until they got outside the station that they were able to realize how deeply the hearts of the people were stirred. The bands struck up several spirited airs—amongst them "Within a Mile o' Edinburgh Toon," and "See the Conquering Hero Comes." The men forming four deep, marched out of the station, preceded by the bands of the Volunteers and Militia, to the tune of "Auld Lang Syne." A tremendous shout of welcome burst forth from the spectators as the first of the "belted plaids" were seen, and hats and handkerchief were waved joyfully from every window. Upon reaching Princes' street so great was the pressure of the people, that the further progress of the 78th was for some minutes barred. The bands ceased playing, and it required all the efforts of the pioneers of the 78th to set matters right.—At last a quarter of an hour elapsed before the regiment was able to move on at a reasonable pace, when the entire force found its way into Princes' street, the enthusiasm of the populace was unbounded. A number of the gallant Highlanders were "relieved" of their guns by obliging friends, and one athletic civilian, making a dash at the regimental band, seized hold of the great drum, and hoisting it aloft, marched on beside the regiment, much to the astonishment of the band-master. There were two or three affecting instances during the march along Princes' street of "auld acquaintances" revived, and one gallant fellow who recognized in the crowd a sister whom he had not seen for many years gave way to deep emotion. When proceeding up the Mound another rebuk took place, which caused another half and delay. It was seven o'clock—very nearly dark—before the last of the 78th were safe in the Castle. How the "wives and families" managed to get safe through the crowd to the Castle, we cannot say, but on reaching their destination—burdened with all sorts of portable baggage—they were treated with very great consideration and kindness. There was no abatement of the warmth of the receipt on till the last straggling baggage cart entered the Esplanade. About seven the immense multitude of spectators quietly dispersed. The length of time the 78th are to remain here is uncertain as not yet fixed, but they will probably not stay for less than three or four months.

The Cleveland Herald relates a story of an old donkey who, to all appearance, died on Sunday night of last week. Preparations were made for his funeral, but while the procession was on its way to the grave, the horse attached to the waggon containing the coffin, took fright, upset the waggon and threw the coffin out. The cheek broke it open, and the mourners were surprised and alarmed to see the donkey himself rise from the ruins, alive. He is still living, and likely to live for some time.

Exhibition of 1862.—At the Council meeting of the Society of Arts on Thursday, the Guarantee Deed for raising a sum of not less than £250,000, on behalf of the Exhibition of 1862 was approved, and the following named as the trustees of the fund: The Earl Granville, K. G., the Lord President of the Council; the Marquis of Chandos, Chairman of the London and North-Western Railway; Thomas Baring, Esq., M. P., and C. W. Dilke, Esq., Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1851; and Thomas Fairbairn, Esq., Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Manchester Art Treasurers Exhibition.

Death of a Remarkable Dog.—"Poor old Bob," the faithful dog of the Scots Fusilier Guards, who accompanied them to Alma, Balaklava, and Inkerman, sharing the thickest of the fight, who returned home with them and was decorated for his bravery, was accidently run over by a cart-wheel on Thursday week and killed. Bob originally belonged to a butcher at Windsor, but he took a fancy to barrack and camp life, catered for himself and never failed to mount guard with his battalion.

COMMERCIAL.

THE TIMBER MARKET.

From Duncan, Ewing & Co's. Timber Circular.

Liverpool, Brunswick Quay, Feb. 29.

Since the 1st February, the supplies to this port of North American Colonial Wood have been brought in 10 vessels, viz:—0 from Quebec, 8 from St. John, N. B., and two from other ports, which have occupied a tonnage of 5,030 tons; during the same time last year there arrived two vessels, the tonnage being 666. The average amount for the like time in 4 years previous to this has been 5,898 tons.—From the North, 3 vessels, 845 tons, wood laden, have arrived; while for the like time last year 0 vessels, 0 tons arrived; the average of four years being 489.

In remarking upon the course which the market has taken since the date of our annual circular, published a month ago, the most important feature to notice is the alteration proposed by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to assimilate the duties payable on Foreign Timber and Deals, with those of Colonial, the rates now leveying 10s per load on tawn, and 7s 6d per load on hewn timber of foreign growth, and 2s and 1s respectively on Colonial, with 5 per cent in addition on the latter.

What the ultimate issue of this proposed alteration may be, remains to be seen.—There are parties which are of opinion that the change, if carried out as proposed, will have a most injurious effect on the North American Colonies, especially on the Spruce Deals of New Brunswick, and Canad an Red Pine. Whether this may be the case or not, the first move, as far as the produce of the North of Europe is concerned, is to put up prices abroad, of both Timber and Deals, to a point which will nearly absorb the reduction. The extreme course may be expected, after a while to adjust itself, the result probably being that the producer and consumer may mutually participate in the remission, the former, however most probably retaining the larger moiety.

The immediate effect of this announced fiscal change on the market has been materially to check a wholesome and active demand which has prevailed with little interruption for some months past; this lull, however, we expect will be of a temporary character only for so long as the manufacturing interests in this, and the adjoining counties continue in their present prosperous state, the consumption of wood goods must of necessity go on.

COLONIAL WOOD.

Pine Timber.—Several cargoes of Quebec Yellow Pine have changed hands during the month, leaving very little to be disposed of on importers' account. Really good St. John's Pine is becoming scarce, very high rates being obtained for prime quality in retail.

Red Pine.—A parcel of Quebec, of good average, brought 18½d per foot, by auction.

Quebec Oak.—The proposed reduction in duty on Foreign Wood will tend still further to depress Quebec Oak, which continues very unsaleable.

Quebec Elm has been taken into consumption to some extent for the use of the Mersey Docks and Harbor Board. Stock remaining over moderate.

Quebec Deals.—A small parcel of Bright Pine, 1st quality, brought £18 10s per standard, by auction,—Stocks of all qualities very low.

Quebec Staves—There has been a more active business transacted in standard of late, principally for the Irish Market.—Puncheon continue dull of sale, the demand running more actively upon steet State bogshead.

$100 A YEAR,

AND upwards saved to the Farmers, by Aldus Mowry's

CHOP GRINDER.

This Machine has just been patented, and has great advantages over any other for the same purpose, now known or in use. It is so simple that any farmer can use it, and it requires but a small amount of power to drive it, two horse power being sufficient; with this amount of power of any kind, it will grind from 18 to 25 bushels of Oats per hour. The grain is ground or rather cut by cast-steel cutters, which are so fitted into the Machine, that they can easily be taken out and repaired at a trifling cost.

All sorts of Grain can be ground without altering or adjusting the Machine.

PRICE $60.

All orders directed to "M. Mowry, Ashburnham, Peterborough," will be promptly attended to.

EFFECT on MANURES on CROPS.

I have now to speak on another point, namely, the effect of manures on the production of plants. Before doing that, let me observe that what we call the roots of turnips and mangel wurzel and such botanically speaking, roots, but bulbous formations intended to accumulate the necessary materials for the production of seed in a subsequent year. Now as regards the growth of plants, There is one thing that ought to be borne in mind by those who are gradually engaged in the work; namely, that you may over-produce a thing, or stimulate one portion of a plant to the detriment of another portion. You know that if you sow wheat upon a dunghill you will get stems like no grain. The reason of this is obvious; and it applies not merely to wheat, but to a great many other plants to which it is not generally supposed to apply: it is this, that too large an amount of stimulating manure at an early period is, to cause the formation of large cellular tissues, by which the power of the manure is thrown too much in the formation or production of the first portion of the plant; and when you want afterwards to fill the cells with the materials of nutrition, it turns out that you have nothing to follow up with. In the case of turnips the result is simply this, that you have a large development of leaf, and too great an extension of the cellular tissues of the turnips, which cells do not subsequently get filled up with the proper amount of starch and other nutritious substances. In the case of wheat the result is similar. You may stimulate wheat, or barley, or oats to such an extent that the product will be all stalk, their being no power to produce the ear of corn; or if the ear be produced, it will contain no seed or seed of inferior quality. It is for this reason—the question being one to which my attention has been directed for some years—that I have recommended the use of salt and lime, and other substances of the same kind, which have the power of arresting the too-early growth of wheat or other straws when your object is to obtain the ear. I think this cannot be repeated too often, for I am sorry to say that, notwithstanding all that has been said on the subject, the facts do not seem to be yet sufficiently appreciated by those who are practically engaged in agriculture. There are only a certain number of weeks after the first germination of the wheat occurs, before the ear is formed. Now if you can stop the too great growth of the straw in the early period before the formation of the ear, the power of the manures which you have put on the land will be thrown directly on the second period of the life of the plant, the seed will be greater in quantity, and the sample of corn undoubtedly better. I cannot cite a better illustration of this than that which is afforded by the experience of the last, when we had as a general rule, too much straw, and too little corn. If you do what I have referred to in any single case, when you ultimately want the last product of the plant, you will find that you have done wrong. On the other hand if you require the mere grass or hay, you cannot manure too highly with ammoniacal and phosphatised matters in order to obtain the largest quantity of produce. In all cases in which you want the early product, the grass or hay, you cannot do better than apply ammoniacal and soluble phosphatical manures to the greatest extent in your power.

SEED CORN.—Every farmer should know that if seed corn is frozen before it is dry, its vitality is destroyed. If farmers will take care that their seed corn is gathered in season to get thoroughly dried before it freezes, there will be no danger of a strange and mysterious failure of seed corn, if the corn is ripe, or nearly ripe, when it is gathered.

PHONOGRAPHY,
OR
WRITING BY SOUND!!

PHONOGRAPHY was invented by ISAAC PITMAN, of Bath, England, in the year 1837. It is the most simple, most natural, most rapid, and most easily learned system of writing which has ever been, or ever can be invented.

During the past fifteen years, hundreds of thousands of persons, in England and America, in both public and private life, have learned to write Phonography, and thousands of social and business letters annually pass through the post office.

Nor is the great popularity to be wondered at. The present system of writing is exceedingly cumbersome, and totally unworthy these days of progress and invention. Phonography is equally as legible, can be learned in one twentieth the time, and can be written six times as fast! In other words, the labor of six days can be performed in one—one man can do the work of six. So simple is the system, too, that a person may learn to write it slowly, in a couple of hours. An hour's daily practice for a few weeks will enable any person to write Phonography with certainty, and with some degree of freedom. The same amount of practice continued for six months will enable a person to take reports of speeches, lectures, sermons, or conversation, and to read them with accuracy.

The late Hon. THOS. H. BENTON, upon being presented with a verbatim report of one of his masterly speeches, taken by a little boy only twelve years of age, said: "Had this art been known 40 years ago it would have saved me 20 years hard labor." The learned senator spoke but a portion of the truth. What long-hand requires six years to accomplish, Phonography will perform in one.

To clergymen, Editors, Physicians, Lawyers, Secretaries, Conveyancers, Law and Medical Students, Lecturers, Printers, School Teachers, Merchants, School Boys and Girls, a knowledge of Phonography is of vast utility. In fact there is no profession or calling in which it is not useful, and no young man's education can be considered complete without it.

During the past 9 months hundreds of persons in Canada, of every pursuit in life, have acquired the Art, from many of whom the subscriber has received neatly-written phonographic letters, expressive of their delight with the attainment, and the extraordinary ease with which they have acquired it.

For the purpose of aiding in the dissemination of so important a reform in his own country, the subscriber is now prepared to supply all who apply, with the MANUAL OF PHONOGRAPHY, and the PHONOGRAPHIC COPY BOOK, sent by mail to any part of the Province, postage pre-paid, for the small sum of ☞ ONE DOLLAR.

Anybody and everybody, who can learn anything, can learn PHONOGRAPHY from the MANUAL without other assistance. Those who wish to be able to put their thoughts to paper at the rate of from 100 to 250 words per minute, should send for the above-mentioned works at once. The instruction given by the Manual is so plain as A. B. C., and ten times as easy to understand.

"THE CANADIAN PHONETIC PIONEER"

Is a Monthly Journal, devoted to the advocacy of the Reform. Price 25 cents per annum.

"STARTLING BUT TRUE!"
SURVIVE OR PERISH."

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.

The history of this great remedy is the most wonderful medical revelation that the world has ever known. It is not a history written by one man, or even derived from the experience of one nation, but consists of a compilation of testimonials from the sick of every country—a record, the like of which has never been adduced in favour of any discovery or invention since time began.

BILIOUS DISORDERS.

In whatever form disease attacks the liver, it is repelled and exterminated by this searching, painless and irresistible sanative.

Let the sick whom the faculty have abandoned resort with confidence to this spiritfulious agent, and a restoration to health and activity will be the unvarying result.

DYSPEPSIA.

The great scourge of this continent yields quickly to a course of these antiseptic Pills and the digestive organs are restored to their proper tone; no matter in what hideous shape this hydra of disease exhibits itself, this searching and unerring remedy disperses it from the patient's system.

GENERAL DEBILITY AND WEAKNESS.

From whatever cause, LOWNESS OF SPIRITS, and all other signs of a diseased liver, and other disorganization of the system, vanish under the conducting influence of this all powerful antiseptic and detergent remedy.

SICKLY FEMALES

Should lose no time in trying a few doses of this regulating and renovating remedy; whatever may be their complaint, it can be taken with safety in all periods and other derangements; its effect is all but miraculous.

Holloway's Pills are the best remedy known in the world for the following diseases:

Asthma,	Headaches,
Bowel Complaints,	Indigestion,
Coughs,	Influenza,
Colds,	Inflammation,
Chest Diseases,	Inward Weakness
Constiveness,	Liver Complaints,
Dyspepsia,	Lowness of Spirits,
Diarrhœa,	Piles.
Dropsy,	Stone and Gravel,
Debility,	Secondary Symptoms,
Fever and Ague,	Venereal Affections.
Female Complaints,	Worms of all kinds.

☞ CAUTION!—None are genuine unless the words "Holloway, New York and London," are discernible as a Water-mark in every leaf of the book of directions around each pot or box; the same may be plainly seen by holding the leaf to the light. A handsome reward will be given to any one rendering such information as may lead to the detection of any party or parties counterfeiting or vending the same, knowing them to be spurious.

. Sold at the Manufactory of Professor HOLLOWAY, 80 Maiden Lane, New York, and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicine throughout the United States and the civilized world, in pots at 25 cents, 63 cents, and $1 each.

☞ There is a considerable saving by taking the larger sizes.

N. B.—Directions for the guidance of patients in every disorder are affixed to each box.

PRACTICAL EXPERIENCE,

EXPERIMENTAL SCIENCE.

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.

CONSOLATION FOR THE SUFFERING.

Nearly fifty years continual use in every part of the habitable globe, amongst the savage and the civilized alike, has proved that simple eruptions, open sores, hard tumors, scrofulous developements of all kinds, abscesses, cancers, old wounds, and, in one word, every species of inflammation and suppuration, whether in the skin, the flesh, the glands, or among the muscles, can be arrested and permanently cured, without danger, by rubbing in and using as a dressing, this inestimable Ointment.

SCROFULA, ERYSIPLAS, AND SALT RHEUM, ERUPTIONS OF THE SKIN, PILES, AND FISTULA.

No remedy has ever done so much for the cure of diseases of the Skin, whatever form they may assume, as this Ointment. No case of Salt Rheum, Scurvy, Sore Heads, Scrofula or Erysiplas, can long withstand its influence.

BAD LEGS, OLD SORES, ULCERS, &c.

Cases of many years standing that have pertinaciously refused to yield to any other remedy or treatment, have invariably succumbed to a few applications of this powerful unguent.

Arising from a bad state of the blood or chronic disease, are eradicated, and a clear and transparent surface regained by the restorative action of this Ointment. It surpasses many exhibition and other tablet appliances in its power to dispel rashes and other disfigurements of the face.

Every form and feature of these prevalent and stubborn disorders is eradicated locally and entirely by the use of this emollient; warm fomentations should precede its application. Its healthy qualities will be found to be thorough and invariable.

Both the Ointment and Pills will be used in the following cases:

Bunions,	Skin Diseases,
Burns,	Swelled Glands,
Chapped Hands,	Sore Legs,
Chilblains,	Sore Breasts,
Fistula,	Sore Heads
Gout,	Sore Throats,
Lumbago,	Sores of all kinds,
Mercurial Eruptions,	Sprains,
Piles,	Stiff Joints,
Rheumatism,	Tetter,
Ringworm,	Ulcers,
Salt Rheum	Wounds of all kinds.
Scalds,

☞ CAUTION!—None are genuine unless the words "Holloway, New York and London" are discernible as a Water-mark in every leaf of the book of directions around each pot or box; the same may be plainly seen by holding the leaf to the light. A handsome reward will be given to any one rendering such information as may lead to the detection of any party or parties counterfeiting or vending the same, knowing them to be spurious.

THIS pleasantly situated at the head of ST. PAUL STREET, amongst the largest and best houses in the city. It has (with business men generally, and especially with the best Merchants of both Provinces) become as great a favorite, that it is now acknowledged to be THE Business Hotel of Montreal. To meet the extensive increase, during the last year in the business of the house, the proprietor has built a large addition. The Dining Room has been extended and made more commodious; there have been completed in the new wing, a great number of well-ventilated sleeping rooms, and the House throughout has been refitted, and now contains many improvements and conveniences hitherto unknown to its guests. The whole of the beds have, at great expense, been furnished with NEW SPRING MATTRASSES. The Proprietor expects that by continuing his personal management of the concern, THE ALBION to say the least of it, will continue to be, as it now is, the best Dollar and a half Hotel in Canada.

HEART ECHOS.

Old songs! they ring upon the brain
Like whispers from the far off sphere,
And with their thrilling spell revive
The garnered love of by-gone years.
What though beneath the sod they lie
That pale array of honored dead;
In hues immortal round the heart,
Still, still a hallowed beam they shed.

Old songs! I never guessed how large
A space was in this heart of mine,
Till, one dull eve, by chance, I found
A well-worn book whose every line
Came back to me as clear as though
But yesterday I'd laid it down,
And there I found the wished-for clue
That spoke of days forever flown.

Oh, when amid the world of doubts,
Of light and shade in which we stray,
We seek some charm by which to drive
Some temporary grief away,
Let they who love such pleasures court
The favorites who entrance the throng
For me I'd find a homelier scene,
And lull me with some good old song.

THE JEW:

OR,

THE OLD HOUSE IN JUDEN STRASSE.

In one of the most distinguished quarters of Frankfort-on-Maine, was the street called Juden Strasse, or Jews Street. Although in the very heart of the city, it was quiet and retired, and not much frequented. A people distinguished only for great wealth, who rarely make use of it, and only hoard it in their coffers without contributing to the various public charities or helping to beautify the city or their residence, will rarely attract others towards them; and therefore the Juden Strasse represented but a small number of the busy residents of Frankfort.

In one of the houses dwelt a Jew, whose love of gain, if indeed such a passion had entered into his soul, was under the full domination of his honesty and integrity. These were jewels which he prized far above the gold and precious stones with which his brethren sought to solace themselves for their outward poverty of appearance.

I will not say that he was not earnestly seeking for means to provide against the future contingencies of fortune, and to lay up something for the little ones who set around his board; but high above all these was enthroned a pure principle of horror and justice, perfectly incorruptible, to the loss of which, wealth and honors could not bribe, nor poverty compel him.

The wife of Ben-Heber Rothschild was a fit companion for such a man. Stately as an eastern princess, and beautiful as only her own race can be, in the wealth and brilliancy of her deep, black eyes and raven hair, distinguished for the peculiar purple tint that flushes over it in the sun's rays, just as they gleam over the ring dove's neck, Sara Rothschild was as good as she was beautiful.

Their house was neat and beautifully ordered. Although the furniture was all of a simple form, yet it was made of a rare, old wood, that now brings its weight in gold.—One closet was devoted to sets of differently-patterned Dresden china—the heir-looms of families who had been impoverished, and who were glad to let them lie in the Jew's closet while they lived upon the money they brought. Ah, how few could redeem them. This closet was often carelessly exposed to strangers, and its wealth of beautiful cups and plates was the theme of many lips, as they were the admiration of the children of Ber-Heber. They indeed, never tired of gazing upon the paintings and fine gilding that enriched the china.

Although the outer closet was thus fearlessly exposed, few would have imagined that behind its seemingly secure back, there was an inner one that contained princely inheritances in gold and diamonds. This was the trust closet—so constructed that the closest inspection would not reveal its existence; that extravagence had pawned, and for which the worthy Jew was receiving profits, but simply those which had been entrusted to his integrity as cheap, and for which he never would be paid.

One night, when the family was about to retire to rest, a faint knock was heard at the door, and was answered by the master of the house. A gentleman, plain and simple in his dress, and carrying nothing, not even a cane, with which to defend himself, appeared on the steps. His person was wholly unknown to the Jew; and it seemed that he was equally so to the stranger; for he was particular in asking for him by name.

He ushered his visitor to the room where his wife was sitting, as he left me, in front of the [illegible] closet, which stood with its wide glass d[illegible], the stranger seemed half disposed to object to the presence of the lovely Sarah; but when this turned him on each hand, and acknowledged his own presence by a bow, which her grave and queenly acquaintance returned into a smile, he seemed [illegible] the [illegible] and [illegible] his business with [illegible]

THE COTTON SUPPLY.

If our hopeless dependence on the United States were the consequence of some inflexible law of nature, one might admire the nerve with which the uncertainties of the future are faced. But the only thing that is certain on the subject is their lust for the obstinate indifference of all who are most concerned in the matter, whether on public or private ground, we might long before this have been comparatively independent of the great American monopoly. The peculiarity of cotton is that it will grow over almost the whole of the intertropical, and many of the temperate, portions of the globe's surface. Asia was familiar with its manufacture before we attempted to manufacture it. The soil and climate of Australia are proved to be very favorable to its growth. Africa is found to be capable of producing samples almost equal to the choicest productions of Georgia. Energy, skill, system and capital alone are wanting to grow within the limits of the British empire more cotton than all the mills of Lancashire could spin; and the thing is not done, because just at present, America is able to furnish us with nearly all that we require. Something, it is true, has been done, both by private enterprise and by Government encouragement, to obtain a larger yield and a superior staple from India and some other countries. But the efforts made have borne no sort of proportion to the importance of the enterprise, though the moderate results which have attended them, afford sufficient earnest of greater success in return for steadier exertion. Adequate profit alone is wanting to increase the Indian supply almost indefinitely—and the way to create profit is this, as in every other investment, to bring capital, skill, and industry to bear upon it. Cheaper modes of transit, increased facilities for irrigation, and more productive methods of cultivation, would probably enable India to withstand the whole world, instead of being kept out of the market by the superior quality and less costly productions of American cotton. The wonderful rapidity with which America has absorbed so large a portion of the cotton cultivation of the world should be an encouragement to those who are engaged in developing other fields of production. Difficulties there may be in the way of acclimatising the choicest sea-island cotton in Hindostan or Australia, or of adopting the short-stapled cotton of India to some of our manufacturing processes. But American land her difficulties of the same kind, and the spirit with which they were overcome is shown by the growth of her exports from one million pounds in 1794 to 1200 millions in 1858. It is credible that with whole continents to choose from where the cotton plant grows wild, English planters should fail to produce a supply capable of rendering us substantially independent on the resources of the United States. To secure this immunity do seem to us to be a duty which presses most heavily perhaps on the manufacturers who are immediately interested, but in no small degree upon the Government and the nation. More than a million laboring mechanics live by cotton, and would perish from a cotton dearth as the Irish perished from the potatoe famine.—Fifty millions sterling of the annual production of the country would be cut off if the precarious supply of cotton should be stopped. In the face of such eventualities it is not wise or right to go on living from hand to mouth without making a determined effort to guard against a calamity almost too formidable to contemplate. Some among us were ready enough to moralize on the Irish improvidence which staked the existence of a people almost exclusively upon a single perishable product. We are doing precisely the same thing ourselves; or, rather, we are courting a greater danger, for the world abounded with other kinds of food which were available when the potato was destroyed. The cotton-tree is no more proof against an epidemic visitation than the potato or the vine; and if the single trunk of the country from which we now draw the bulk of our supplies were reduced to barrenness, the whole earth could not give us an immediate substitute for the cotton of the United States. No peril of war could equal the peril of a cotton dearth and while we rightly prepare to cope with the one danger, it does not seem little less than madness to take no timely precautions against a still more formidable, though possibly a less immediate rise.

FRANCE AND THE POPE.

From the London Times, Feb. 22.

The breach between the Imperial and Pontifical Courts is widening every day, and begins to remind us very forcibly of an earlier period of our own history, when a king who had signalized himself in the ranks of Rome, and from our sovereigns even now derive the title "defender" of another and a purer faith, was led step by step to dispute the jurisdiction, to deny the power, and to enhance the ministers of Rome. If the Pope has been ready to use the language of complaint, and even of menace, he has encouraged it quite as much by the bearing as by his terms, which retreats upon him, his every concession, and answers to the charge of despotism and revolutionary principles by betraying the Pope, with the most perfect truth of pairing on things sacred with things profane, and treating the rags of an odious tyranny as the sacred cloth that covers the mysteries of the altar.

Thus stands the controversy between the Emperor and the Pontiff; yet, having boldly confronted the master, the Sovereign of France is not the man to recede timidly before the aggression of the servants, and we now find the French government for the first time since the restoration of 1814 openly and avowedly on a position of antagonism [illegible] clergy. In this respect the [illegible] with a power which [illegible] practically from its own bench the liberty of the press. When he [illegible] the Bishops to put [illegible] the Catholic Church and reserve [illegible] Country, the Council [illegible] the law makers, and the Church its [illegible] and sacred privileges. will not take upon me to say; but that it is a principle cause of such no one who has at all studied the subject will deny; and a cause patent one that many suppose. It will be observed that most smokers begin young, and their earliest spending have been in tobacco; sums perhaps insignificant in themselves, but momentous in laying a train of improvident habits, which may lead to vice, degradation and loss of character: and I'd sooner believe that the patrons of the Theatre and the Ball room were the friends of the religion of Jesus, to believe that these opinions expressed by eminent medical and scientific men were untrue.—Let temperance men also endeavour to prevent the young acquiring a habit injurious both to themselves and posterity.

But we live in strange times; times in which expediency has usurped the place of principle. Where can we find that invincible and indomitable spirit evinced by the champions of the reformation; or that principle and courage which inspired Scotland's covenanted wildness, when they resisted into blood, striving for liberty of conscience; when amid the green glens, and the dark hills of their native land they toiled not, faltered not, till the surplus minions of a tyrant were driven from their loved Caledonia; and why should not the same spirit be called into existence against intemperance. Is it not the Juggernaut of the 19th century, and who can number the thousands who self-immolate themselves beneath its [illegible]. Time as regards numbers [illegible] intemperance out-number those of intemperance. Still this need not make any one despair, for it is given not only to the poet, and the student, and the philosopher, but even to the statesman and the man of business, and the world to

BY THE "ARABIA."

NAPOLEON DETERMINED UPON THE ANNEXATION OF SAVOY.

French Troops ready to March.

New York, March 30.

The Arabia arrived this morning. News important.

GREAT BRITAIN.

A Calcutta telegram of the 10th inst., simply announcing the burning of the ship Red Jacket, reached England on the 16th inst.

Telegraph communication between Alexandria and Kurrachee is perfect.

An address to the Crown, approving of the French commercial treaty, was agreed to in the House of Lords by a majority of 30.

The British Government had received a despatch from France declaring the annexation of Savoy to be absolutely necessary, but stating that the feelings of the Savoyards will be consulted before decisive measures are taken.

Mr. Monk and John Bowell explained the position of affairs with China, and said that reasonable indemnity would be demanded, and enforced if necessary, but he did not think it necessary to go to Pekin.

Twenty thousand pounds had been paid by Denmark for a subsidy to the North Atlantic Telegraph, via Greenland, &c.

Some of the English journals are getting fierce with Napoleon on the Savoy question which will be settled by treaty between France and Sardinia, before the Savoyards are consulted.

Switzerland had sent a protest against the annexation.

It was reported that French troops were under orders for Chambery.

The Bourse closed dull at 68.

Full returns of the voting in Italy show an overwhelming majority in favor of annexation to Sardinia. The vote in Tuscany was 366,000 for annexation, and 15,000 for a separate kingdom. No steps had been taken yet.

An insurrection in Naples was considered imminent.

Calcutta advices report a further advance in freights, and a large increase in the export duty of saltpetre.

The Anglo-Saxon, from Portland, arrived at Liverpool on the 16th inst. The Vigo, from New York, arrived on the same date. The Arago arrived at Southampton on the 19th.

In the House of Lords, on the 16th, the state of Naples was debated, and the Duke of Somerset said that protection would be afforded to political refugees who might seek for it on board the British men-of-war vessels in the Bay of Naples.

In the House of Commons, Mr. Haliburton asked if the attention of the Government had been directed to the fact that the Island of St. Pierre, near Newfoundland, had been fortified by the French Government.

Lord John Russell said that the case had been referred to the law officers of the Crown, who were of opinion that the French Government had not violated the stipulations of the treaty.

Lord John Russell also made some explanations in regard to a Chinese expedition. He admitted that it was not desirable to proceed to Pekin, but it would be unwise to say that it should not be done if their offers were refused. An indemnity would be demanded, and if not accepted before the Gulfs entered, it would be insisted upon.

A general debate ensued, in which Mr. Bright and others strongly condemned the policy of Mr. Bruce.

Lord Palmerston defended Mr. Bruce, and said that England would very likely be ordered by submitting to the indignities which the American minister had met with. He had no idea that the Emperor of China was prepared to go to war for the Pekin affair.

The £100,000 preference capital authorized by the great Indian railway bill all been applied for by the shareholders, and the subscription list was closed.

The Daily News of the 17th says that all the statements respecting the state of Lord Derby's health are untrue, but that he is in a very serious condition, in consequence of a severe attack of gout, which has returned since the fall of the great Napoleon. Nothing further is known of the most eminent will be able to participate in the parliamentary [illegible] Europe has to reckon with a person which requires upon the part of England, and which has cast all respect for [illegible] Queen [illegible] Empire [illegible] entire demand. ARRIVAL OF THE "ARABIA."

[illegible]

The Canadian dispatch vessel has arrived from Quebec with the Prince of Wales on board. She left Quebec on the 19th inst.

Rome, March 16.—The assembly of great cardinals in favour of the Pope had taken place at the Vatican.

Paris, Saturday.—The Nord publishes a letter from Turin, stating that the Powers. In the case of serious disapproval and opposition on the part of European States, which, however, is not anticipated, then France would gratuitously consent to the establishment of Savoy as an independent State. What is positive is that France will never consent, under any circumstances, to the retention of what are called the French slopes of the Alps by Sardinia, enlarged as she will be by a power inferior only to Prussia.

FRANCE.

The Paris correspondent of the London Times says that it is certain that the order to the French army in Lombardy to be ready to march at a moment's notice has been countermanded.

The Paris correspondent of the Times says that an autograph letter, from the Emperor Napoleon, cruocled in an angry style had been received by Victor Emanuel.—The Emperor invites the King not to accept Tuscany in its own name, notwithstanding the test of universal suffrage. He may name a Prince of his own house for Tuscany, and according to the same report, he is debarred from occupying the Romagna which may be governed by a Vicar acceptable to the Pope.

As the Sardinian Government declares in advance its acceptation of the result of the voting, a rumour was current that Piedmontese troops would forthwith enter Tuscany.

Another rumour was that the eldest son of the King of Sardinia, would be proposed for the Crown of Tuscany.

SPAIN AND MOROCCO.

A Madrid telegram states that on the 12th of March, a Moorish messenger delivered a message to Marshall O'Donnell from the Emperor of Morocco, professing his desire for peace.

ITALY.

Modena, March 16.—The result of the voting in the Æmelian provinces has been proclaimed, and is as follows:—Total number of electors inscribed on the the list, 526,258; number who voted 27,512; for annexation to Piedmont, 429,006; separate kingdom, 759; cancelled, 750.

Florence, March 16.—A decree has been published, convoking the electoral assemblies of the 25th of March in order to proceed to the election of deputies to parliament.

The Paris correspondent of the Times learns that the second warning, which immediately excommunicates, has been sent to Turin. After a certain interval, the bull of excommunication against Emmanuel will be issued.

Two regiments of dragoons, quartered at Lyons, have received marching orders.—They are going to Chambery the capital of Savoy.

The Sardinian Cabinet is expected to meet on the 12th of April.

A regiment of Chasseurs have left Turin to be ready to enter Tuscany and proceed to Florence as soon as the King of Sardinia accepts the annexation. Other troops have left their quarters to be ready to enter the Romagna. General Fanti has just organized the army into four corps. Each will be composed of three divisions, two Piedmontese, and the third of Central Italy.

It is stated that one of the first acts of the Government, as soon as the annexation shall have been declared, will be to open a loan of 400,000,000 francs.

LATEST.

Paris, March 16.—The Moniteur contains a report of the Minister of War, Marshal Randon, who proposes, as the ideas of war were receding, to reduce the effective strength of the battallions of the Chasseurs from eight to six companies, the force which existed before 1853. The report is followed by a decree of the Emperor, approving of the ministerial proposal.

We are informed, says the Courrier de Paris, that the election in Savoy and in the county of Nice, to decide on the annexation of these provinces to the French empire, will take place on the 18th inst.

Chambery, Friday, March 16.—The Courrier des Alps announces, upon information derived from an authentic source, that the 1st and 2nd regiments of dragoons, now stationed at Lyons, have received orders to leave for Chambery.

Perth, March 16.—Yesterday about two hundred students attempted a demonstration at the churches and church-yards at this place. Several students were arrested. On an attempt being made to rescue them, the police reverted to their weapons and wounded several persons. The population did not in any way take part in the demonstration.

The official Gazette of Turin publishes the address to the King from the clergy of the several Provinces, expressive of their conviction, and that the question of the Romagna is quite distinct from the interests of religion.

The Paris correspondent of the Daily News says there is some reason to think that a favourable change in the French government has taken place. On Wednesday it was disposed to challenge the annexation of the Romagna, and to press the King of Sardinia to negotiate further with the Pope. Yesterday it was reported that events in Italy will be suffered for the present at least, to follow their natural course.

The Le Nord publishes a despatch from Antonelli, in reply to the last notice of M. Thouvenel. It uncompromisingly demands the return of the revolted provinces before even the question of reform can be entertained, and complains that if their revolt has not ceased, it is because the Holy Father cannot obtain the support he might have expected. The rebellion has been fomented from without, and the Cardinal cannot see why it should not be extinguished by legitimate assistance from abroad, and it cannot but be fairly asserted that the succor offered by the Catholic nations to their common father is in reality assistance from abroad.

The American ship Lady Suffolk from Liverpool to Calcutta, was abandoned in a sinking state, in 49 deg. north latitude. The crew landed at Plymouth.

ARRIVAL OF THE "ARABIA."

[illegible]

New York, April 2.

The steamship Arabia arrived this morning from Liverpool via Londonderry, with dates to the 17th inst.

London, March 16.—The assembly of great cardinals in favour of the Pope had taken place at the Vatican.

Paris, Saturday.—The Nord publishes a letter from Turin, stating that the proposition of annexation of Savoy to France had been definitely settled. The Sardinian states that negotiations in regard to Tuscany are in a fair way of conclusion.

The Emperor received a deputation from Savoy.

Naples, March 14.—The Neapolitans had been sent into exile, and others were informed that they may remain in Naples. Austria had disapproved of the severe measures intended.

An Austrian General had arrived. Ambassadors from the western powers had given advice to the King.

A Turin letter of the 13th says the Sardinian Parliament will not meet till the 12th of April. The King intends, when the expression of the wishes of the population of Romagna are made to him, to deliver a speech declaring that he postpones the acceptance for the present, adding that negotiations are opened for the purpose of reconciling those wishes with respect for the rights of the Holy See. Unfortunately these negotiations only postpone the crisis for a few days.

The annexation of Central Italy to Piedmont is accepted every where with great enthusiasm.

At the end of next the King will start on a tour in the province which voted for annexation.

One of the first acts of the Government, as soon as annexation is declared, will be to open a loan of one hundred millions, one-half to be negotiated abroad, and the rest subscribed for at home.

The Paris correspondence of the Times says: There is great wrath here against the Pope. I am told His Holiness issued another circular, still stronger than the encyclical on the Romagna affair.

Letters from Rome say that agitation is so great that it is doubtful whether the French army will be able to restrain it much longer.

The second warning which immediately precedes excommunication, is said to have been sent to Turin.

SHOCKING TRAGEDY AT WAYNESBORO, GA.

The telegraph has recently reported a shocking tragedy at Waynesboro', Georgia, on the 6th inst., by which three persons lost their lives. The Savannah News furnishes particulars of the affair, from which it appears that the difficulty existed between John Owens, a merchants of Waynesboro', and John W. Walker, a plantation overseeer, and on that day Walker deliberately shot and killed Owens. He then immediately left for his home some three miles from town. The excitement in the town became very great, and five citizens with guns and dogs started to arrest him. On their arrival at Walker's house, Walker issued from the door armed with a rifle, pistol and a knife. The party called upon him to surrender, when he assumed an attitude of defiance and refused, while his wife in great distress clung to him to prevent further violence. Throwing her off he levelled his rifle and was about to fire, when the whole party of pursuers discharged their pieces, killing him instantly, and putting two buck shot through the arm and hand of his wife, and mortally wounding his daughter, a little girl about seven years old, who was in the house at the time, a buck shot having entered her face below the eye, and lodged in the rear portion of her brain.

TERRIBLE DISASTER IN NEW YORK.

TEN PERSONS BURNED TO DEATH.

At an early hour on Wednesday a fire broke out in the four story frame tenement house No. 90, West 45th street, and spread with great rapidity to the adjoining buildings, Nos. 84, 86 and 88. Owing to the combustable nature of the material of which the building was composed, and to the fact that some mistake had been made in giving the alarm, the flames had gained considerable headway before the fire engines were able to get to work.

The buildings 88 and 90 were entirely destroyed, and ten unfortunate tenants, who were asleep at the time, were burned to death.

The fire originated beneath the stairway on the first floor, and as in the case of the Elm St., calamity, the egress of the inmates were cut off by the flames rushing up the stairs. The cause of the fire appears to be a mystery, and is attributed by the police to an incendiary.

SUSPECTED MURDER IN HAMILTON.

An inquest was held at the Police Office this morning, on the body of Samuel Atkinson, of Dundas, shoemaker, formerly of this city. Deceased was found at half-past three o'clock yesterday morning lying on the sidewalk in John street opposite to Kinrade's Bakery, and near the Church of the Ascension. He was taken to the Police Office, and kept there as an ordinary case of drunkenness, which, it seem, was rendered the more probable, as he had evidently been drinking. Later on in the day, as he did not revive, Dr. Duggan was sent for, who, upon examination, found a wound over the left ear, and perceived that there had been bleeding, though not to any extent, through that aperture. At the inquest the testimony of the police was rendered, which merely doubled the fact of the finding and committal to the cells, and from which it appeared that they had not noticed any blood, or other circumstance to excite their vigilance. The Coroner ordered a professional examination, and Drs. Duggan and Beaston proceeded to remove the upper part of the skull. This operation disclosed a wound of about two inches in length on the left side of the head, which might have been made by some blunt instrument either of great weight or applied with very considerable force, as the skull is broken in more than one direction, and to some distance. About a pint of [illegible] blood [illegible] the brain. The police observed no stones or other substance on the sidewalk which would account for the infliction of such a wound by the deceased falling thereon. When taken up he spoke, and would appear to have been capable of [illegible] [illegible] of mind but [illegible]—Hamilton Times of Saturday.

THE PRINCE INVITED TO [illegible]

A largely attended public meeting was held recently in that city, for the promotion of the object stated. The matter had been taken up by the council, but the citizens were not pleased with their management of it. The speakers on this occasion were Messrs. Anderson (in the chair), Lawrence, Adam J. I. McKinnon, McCauley, Cassels, [illegible] Lemoine, Gamble, [illegible] the French Canadian [illegible] Ferres, Hall and Hime. The resolutions of the Council were unanimously and warmly condemned, and petitions to the Prince against receiving the invitation, and a petition to Her Majesty [illegible] were got and extensively signed. A number of gentlemen were appointed to [illegible] the petitions to the proper quarters.

THE REFORM BILL.

The country, upon the whole, seems to be satisfied with the new scheme of amendment, and we think with good reason, for it is certainly the best considered of all those proposals for reforming the franchise that have of late years been brought forward.—The moderate party, at all events, whether nominally Conservative or Liberal, can have no good reason for objecting to the proposed changes, none of which can be accused of being of an extreme character. While differing in detail from the Bill of Mr. Disraeli, and differing very greatly for the better, the only point of fundamental importance which distinguishes it from that measure is the reduction of the burgh franchise to six pounds. But it is known that Mr. Disraeli, in the event of his being allowed an opportunity to bring in a second Bill, had promised to make a provision of the same nature, and he could scarcely have thought to propose any change in the direction short of a six pound franchise. The Conservative ground of objection to the Bill, therefore, seems to be taken away, and a mere factious opposition to it from this quarter, unless supported by members for some of the burghs whose representatives are to be reduced in number, and other malcontents, is not likely to be successful.

From the extreme Liberal side the great objection to the Bill, of course, is just the opposite of that made by the Conservatives. According to the latter it concedes too much; the complaint of the former is that does not concede enough. Not being absolutely revolutionary in character it does not meet the views of those who desire to see a grand coup d'etat to whom practical and safe improvement is distasteful, a class of people who, if they obtained all that they wanted to-day, would discover to-morrow that the change was of no avail, and that some other revolutionary measure was necessary to limit those very rights for which they are now so clamorous. These people dislike the Bill because it does not surrender everything to certain arbitrary theories of their own, and they may also be supposed to be in a measure of ill-humor because their long cherished ideas are at length about to be realized in great part, and the realization will put an end to the pleasant sort of political dream which may be said to have comprehended all their ideas on the subject of the public good. What in a vote after all? they will shortly ask. Like the hero of the comedy, after he had obtained everything that his heart desired, they will be apt to exclaim, "Nothing in it," and least of all that particular virtue which they have been accustomed to expect, a correction for all the follies and ills of human government.

No long time will elapse ere the discovery is made that the Bill goes quite far enough in the way of reducing the property qualification to vote. There will no doubt be many practical grievances under the new system, and there are whole classes of intelligent people, including the mass of the working men in the country towns where rents are low, who will doubtless feel aggrieved by their exclusion from the list of voters. But this evil will be remedied in course of time, for, as has been shown, the progressive increase in the value of property in relation to the money standard is such that ten years hence the occupant of a five pound dwelling will, if his condition keep pace with that of the country generally, be paying six pounds, and thus become entitled to the vote. Another important class who have not, however, at any time made their grievances heard, are those who do not themselves rent or own premises on their own account. For this class, comprising a very large proportion of the intelligence of the country, the present Bill of Lord John Russell makes no provision, eashewing, as it does, all those "fancy franchise" which found a place in the measure he formerly introduced, as well as in that of Mr. Disraeli. With the property qualification retained at six pounds, the loss of this class of persons will not be of so much consequence as it would have been had the franchise been further reduced, as regards the occupants of property. Yet some complaint may be made, and, in the true conservative interest of the country, is likely to be made, on account of the exclusion of so much intelligence at the time when an humbler class of property occupants are having the franchise extended to them. In Canada we have an illustration in point as to the working of a low property qualification stopping short of manhood suffrage. The qualification there is nearly the same in amount as Lord John Russell proposes for boroughs and counties in England. This franchise, in short, admits the humblest laboring man, but it excludes the mass of mercantile employees, the dwellers in hotels and boarding-houses, who, on this side of the Atlantic, from such a large proportion of the male population.—In Canada the idea of reducing the qualification lower than it is at present, for the purpose of admitting an humbler class of voters is never spoken of. The most democratic politicians say it is low enough in all conscience, and what they desire by way of amendment,—if they can be said to have any desire on a subject with reference to which they do not seem to think it worth their while to make any movement—is that intelligence of the non-tenant mercantile class should be brought in to counterbalance the ignorance and corruption of a large proportion of the humbler class of tenants, who in many cases, derive their entire subsistence from their miserable thirty or forty dollar lots. The evil of excluding the thousands of educated persons in Great Britain who are neither householders nor shopkeepers would, as we have said, been very serious, if the franchise had been reduced lower than is proposed, and in this view, universal suffrage would certainly be preferable to Mr. Bright's plan of admitting all persons who pay poor-rates. But even with the qualification at six pounds it is a question if it is not advisable to take special means to admit the class, say, rate 4s, even at the risk of creating a "fancy franchise."

This omission, we are inclined to regard as almost the only serious objection to the Bill, which in all the provisions it does enter is certainly most judicious. It is eminently to be hoped that this opposition to it will be overcome, and that it will pass into law forthwith. The British people have long enough had their fingers in the dissension pie of this class of question, and are altogether unfortunate to the true purpose of government. And this we say out of no conservative disposition, but because we desire to see these dead questions buried with the [illegible] [illegible] and never [illegible] [illegible] All those who are reformers in earnest, radicals in the truest and profoundest sense, their intelligent minority which [illegible] [illegible] to the vast [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

WORK IN THE KITCHEN GARDEN.

April is a busy time with those who have gardens. Much has to be done as soon as the frost is out, in preparing the ground for planting. It is however not desirable to sow seeds for main crops but only such as can be advantageously grown as an early summer crop.

PEAS.—A few rows of early peas may be sown, such as the Dwarf Kent and Prince Albert. Plant in rows three feet apart and soak the seeds for a few hours, and roll them in plaster before sowing.

Onion seed may be sown in rows one foot apart. One ounce of seed will sow a bed 24 feet long by 4 wide.

Parsnips are a desirable crop to get into the ground early. The ground for them should be dry, deep, and well pulverized.—Sow in rows 18 inches apart. In May thin out to 8 inches apart in the rows.—With good after cultivation no crop will yield a better return for the labour bestowed. The best variety is the Hollow crowned.

BEETS.—These are worthy of a place in every garden. The Blood Beet, either long or turnip rooted, is the only kind we should grow. Some like the white sugar beet.—Soak the seed a day or two before planting and sow in rows 18 inches apart.

CARROTS.—Some sow the Early Short Horn this month. It is the best variety for garden culture, and succeeds well on any moderately rich soil.

PARSLEY.—This forms a neat edging for the ends of the different beds next the larger walks of the garden. It is useful in flavoring stews, soups and gravies. Some like it for salads.

TURNIPS.—A bed of the Early white globe or Early Dutch will be found useful for summer use. Sow broadcast and afterwards thin out as desired.

CABBAGE.—Sow some seed of early kinds, as the Early York, Sugarloaf and Winningstadt, as well as some of the early varieties of Cauliflowers. Sow broadcast in a richly manured spot in the open border where the sun can have free access to the plants.

RADISHES.—The best kinds are the Long Salmon and the Red and white Turnip. Sow broadcast in a warm border and give enough seed. Rake it over lightly, and in three or four days the plants will appear. Pull the largest of them as they grow to a size fit for the table. Sow a fresh bed every two or three weeks to keep up a succession.

LETTUCE.—The earliest sown are the best—in fact those self sown the previous summer are often to be found plentifully in most gardens. To attain perfection they should afterwards be transplanted into an open border, and when of tolerable size, tied up, so as to become white and solid at the heart.

CRESSES, mustard and various other salads may be sown as soon as the ground is ready for them.

TOMATOES.—No garden should be without them. The earliest plants are the best, and as it is an object to get the fruit ripened as early as possible, it is well to sow some seeds early and protect the young plants from frost till they can be transplanted. The best kinds are the Large smooth red and the Yellow Plum. The Fejee and Perfected are two new kinds that have recently appeared, which we have not tried, but have heard them highly recommended.

POTATOES.—A few early potatoes, such as the Ash-leaved Kidney or Early June may be planted, and if frost is anticipated after they come up, protect the plants with boards or straw. Plant whole in hills, one potato in each.

Don't forget to prune up all the small fruits, and tie up such as seem to need it. Clean out and fork over the strawberry and asparagus beds, and get the whole garden into neat and trim order.

WALLING HOUSES.—A correspondent of the Country Gentleman suggests the offering of premiums at annual county fairs for the fast walking as well as the fast trotting horses. He says he knew a man who slept from two to four teams at work on the road, and never allowed them to trot at all; yet he made the distance in quicker time than his neighbors who made their horses trot at every convenient place. He said that when a horse walked after trotting, he walked much slower than his common gait, it kept continually on the walk, and then lost more than he gained by the trotting.

TASTE OF TURNIPS IN MILK.—I noticed an article in the Farmer stating that if turnips were fed to cows after milking, morning and night, the milk will not taste. We have tried it all this winter, but still the milk and butter tasted of the turnips.—We left off feeding turnips a little more than a week, and fed with carrots, and the milk and butter were sweet and nice.

PHONOGRAPHY, OR WRITING BY SOUND!!

PHONOGRAPHY was invented by ISAAC PITMAN, of Bath, England, in the year 1837. It is the most simple, most natural, most rapid, and most easily learned system of writing which has ever been, or ever can be invented.

During the past fifteen years, hundreds of thousands of persons, in England and America, in both public and private life, have learned to write Phonography, and thousands of social and business letters annually pass through the post office.

Nor is the great popularity to be wondered at. The present system of writing is exceedingly cumbersome, and totally unworthy these days of progress and invention. Phonography is equally as legible, can be learned in one twentieth the time, and can be written six times as fast! In other words, the labor of six days can be performed in one—one man can do the work of six So simple is the system, too, that a person may learn to write it slowly, in a couple of hours. An hour's daily practice for a few weeks will enable any person to write Phonography with certainty, and with some degree of freedom. The same amount of practice continued for six months will enable a person to take reports of speeches lectures, sermons, or conversation, and to read them with accuracy.

The late Hon. THOS. H. BENTON, upon being presented with a verbatim report of one of his masterly speeches, taken by a little boy only twelve years of age, said: "Had this art been known 40 years ago it would have saved me 30 years hard labor." The learned senator spoke but a portion of the truth. What long-hand requires six years to accomplish, Phonography will perform in one.

To clergymen, Editors, Physicians, Lawyers, Secretaries, Conveyancers, Law and Medical Students, Lecturers, Printers, School Teachers, Merchants, School Boys and Girls, a knowledge of Phonography is of vast utility. In fact there is no profession or calling in which it is not useful, and no young man's education can be considered complete without it.

During the past 9 months hundreds of persons in Canada, of every pursuit in life, have acquired the Art, from many of whom the subscriber has received neatly-written phonographic letters, expressive of their delight with the attainment, and the extraordinary ease with which they have acquired it.

For the purpose of aiding in the dissemination of so important a reform in his own country, the subscriber is now prepared to supply all who apply, with the MANUAL OF PHONOGRAPHY, and the PHONOGRAPHIC COPY BOOK, sent by mail to any part of the Province, postage pre-paid, for the small sum of ONE DOLLAR.

Anybody and everybody, who can learn anything, can learn PHONOGRAPHY from the MANUAL without other assistance. Those who wish to be able to put their thoughts to paper at the rate of from 100 to 250 words per minute, should send for the above-mentioned works at once. The instruction given by the Manual is as plain as A. B. C., and ten times as easy to understand.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS.

The history of this great remedy is the most wonderful medical revelation that the world has ever known. It is not a history written by one man, or even derived from the experience of one nation, but consists of a compilation of testimonials from the sick of every country—a record, the like of which has never been adduced in favour of any discovery or invention since time began.

BILIOUS DISORDERS.

In whatever form disease attacks the liver, it is repelled and exterminated by this searching, painless and irresistible curative.

Let the sick whom the faculty have abandoned resort with confidence to this antibilious agent, and a restoration to health and activity will be the unvarying result.

DYSPEPSIA.

The great scourge of this continent yields quickly to a course of these antiseptic Pills and the digestive organs are restored to their proper tone; no matter in what hideous shape this hydra of disease exhibits itself, this searching and unerring remedy disperses it from the patient's system.

GENERAL DEBILITY AND WEAKNESS.

PRACTICAL EXPERIENCE,

EXPERIMENTAL SCIENCE.

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.

CONSOLATION FOR THE SUFFERING.

Nearly fifty years continual use in every part of the habitable globe, amongst the savage and the civilized alike, has proved that simple eruptions, open sores, hard tumors, scrofulous developements of all kinds, abscesses, cancers, old wounds, and, in one word, every species of inflammation and suppuration, whether in the skin, the flesh, the glands, or among the muscles, can be arrested and permanently cured, without danger, by rubbing in and wearing as a dressing, this inestimable Ointment.

SCROFULA, ERYSIPELAS, AND SALT RHEUM, ERUPTIONS OF THE SKIN, PILES, AND FESTULA.

No remedy has ever done so much for the cure of diseases of the Skin, whatever form they may assume, as this Ointment. No case of Salt Rheum, Scurvy, Sore Heads, Scrofula or Erysipelas, can long withstand its influence.

BAD LEGS, OLD SORES, ULCERS, &c.

Cases of many years standing that have pertinaciously refused to yield to any other remedy or treatment, have invariably succumbed to a few applications of this powerful unguent.

Arising from a bad state of the blood or else some disease, are eradicated, and a clear and transparent surface regained by the restorative action of this Ointment. It surpasses many of the cosmetics and other toilet appliances in its power to dispel rashes and other disfigurements of the face.

Every form and feature of them prevalent and stubborn disorders is eradicated locally and entirely by the use of this emollient; warm fomentations should precede its application. Its healthy qualities will be found to be thorough and invariable.

Both the Ointment and Pills will be used in the following cases:

Bunions,	Skin Diseases,
Burns,	Swelled Glands,
Chapped Hands,	Sore Legs,
Chilblains,	Sore Breasts,
Fistula,	Sore Heads,
Gout,	Sore Throats,
Lumbago,	Sores of all kinds,
Mercurial Eruptions,	Sprains,
Piles,	Stiff Joints,
Rheumatism,	Tetter,
Ringworm,	Ulcers,
Skin Diseases,	Venereal Sores,
Scalds,	Wounds of all kinds.

CAUTION—None are genuine unless the words "Holloway, New York and London" are discernible as a Water-mark in every leaves of the book of directions around each pot or box; the same may be plainly seen by holding the leaf to the light. ALBION HOTEL,
MONTREAL.
L. W. BECKER, Proprietor.
THE pleasantly situated at the head of ST. PAUL STREET, and one of the largest & most desirable houses in the city. It has (with business men generally, and especially with the best Merchants of both Provinces) become so great a favorite, that it is now acknowledged to be THE Business Hotel of Montreal. To meet the extensive increase, during the last year in the business of the house, the proprietor has built a large addition. The Dining Room has been extended and made more comfortable; there have been completed in the new wing, a great number of well-ventilated sleeping rooms, and the House throughout has been refitted, and now contains many improvements and conveniences hitherto unknown to its guests. The whole of the beds have, at a great expense, been furnished with NEW SPRING MATTRASSES. The Proprietor expects that by continuing his present management of the concern, THE ALBION, to say the least of it, will continue to be, as it now is, the best Dollar and a half Hotel in Canada.

We ... ...
... ...ght select, many

... ...al interest, and to enable
... ...judge of the Lecturer's descriptive powers, we must for the present ...sat ourselves with the following graphic picture of Damascus and the road thereto. Next day we passed along a projection of Mount Hermon, very rich ironstone, and came to Rasheiya with about 3,500 inhabitants, nearly all working in iron. We then took a wild desolate mountain track over the northern part of Hermon, (through large snow gulches) which brought us to Rakhleh; there is here the ruin of a once magnificent Temple but the wild seclusion of this place was very striking, only a few miserable houses and caves, out of which came a number of fan most during looking creatures all armed; it was too late to proceed further, so we made the best arrangements we could, by placing my daughter's tent in the centre, and the other tents around it, we fired off five and six barrel revolvers before them, loaded them again and showed that we were ready to defend ourselves, and being a strong party of eight, besides our attendants, who stood guard, and caused the night to pass undisturbed, got up next morning very early, and started for Damascus; our splendid Arab tent had to us by Sheik Wady Barada, Fifty years ago there was a cold blooded murder committed here, in a house where the English Consul from Damascus happened to be sleeping for the night; in the morning he received a polite apology for having unconsciously disturbed his repose, saying had it been known that he the Consul was there, he the murderer, would have postponed his work to a more suitable season. Shortly after, we came to the ruins of a once splendid Temple, 126 feet long by 63 wide, the Ionic Pilasters at the angles, with columns all round, shattered and broken; we afterwards entered a region of bleak grey hills, without a tree, or shrub, or tuft of grass.—No where in Syria is there a more desolate region, than that now before us, it only wants the sand to make it a match for the worst places in the desert. We could understand the language of Scripture "the earth that is under thee shall be iron, and the heaven that is over thy head shall be brass;" the pouring hot sun's direct rays falling upon us, the only pleasant feature in the vast Pandrama was Hermon with its beautiful snow capped down into a beautiful glen, filled with trees covered with foliage, and sparkling with streams and fountains of water; this led us to the golden flowing river, the Abana; little villages now were peeping from their bowers, on the right as well as on the left. We crossed the Abana by a substantial bridge with a prayer niche on its parapet, we had then to clamber again the naked white hill side, and half an hour more brought us to the brow of a hill with a Moslem Tomb; here the ancient city of Damascus and its plain, burst at once upon our view. The sight was so sudden and unexpected, it seemed like a glorious vision. We stood about 800 feet above the city and plain; the plain is well wooded, and is one continuous garden, so far as the eye could carry, upwards of fifty miles, watered by the Abana and Parphar. A shower of sunbeams were falling at the time, which gave a softness and beauty to the whole picture which ravished our minds as we gazed on the glorious panorama, and we could not help saying, are not Abana and Parphar better than all the waters of Israel.—When Mahommed stood on the same spot as he came from Mecca, he was overpowered by this view, and said, I can only enjoy one Paradise, and therefore will not go into Damascus. We descended the steep hill side, the road passing through among many tombs all in a state of dilapidation.—We entered a large suburb, and a quarter of an hour brought us to the gate of Damascus; threaded our way through many streets and lanes, we at last found ourselves comfortably lodged in the Hotel Locanada Meliph, the finest we saw in the east. Here we remained part of five days. To describe Damascus would occupy a whole evening; suffice it to say, that this ancient city was founded by Us, the great-grand son of Noah; Abraham's Steward was Eliezer of Damascus. Here the captive maid was placed in the Harem of Naaman and waited on his wife; seeing the leprosy of her master, she said, Would to God my lord were with the Prophet that is in Samaria, for he would recover him of his leprosy.—We visited the mosque which stands on the site of the House of Rimmon, into which Naaman deposited the two mules' burden of earth, that he brought from Palestine. This mosque is the largest in Damascus,—1100 feet long, 600 wide; we walked very often in the street which is call Straight—saw the house of Judas where Paul lodged,—the house of Ananias—the tombs of Naaman, which is now an hospital for the lepers,—the window in the city wall from which Paul was let down in a basket,—the tomb of George the porter who aided Paul in his escape, and lost his hand for so doing. We rode out to the plain where Paul was converted; we were there about noon, under the brilliancy of that eastern sky and the rays of that midday sun. What must that light have been which shone from heaven above the brightness of the sun and struck down Saul, and those that were with him, to the ground? We visited the Governor's Palace and received the most hospitality. We spent a delightful week here in the leisure[illegible] all the customs of Asia are there of every fantastic form, but nothing attracts so much notice as "an Orthodox English Hat." We heard of a party that was robbed of everything; they stripped all of them naked, but left the English gentlemen standing with his hat on. There is one bright [illegible] the Protestant Mission, [illegible] since 1844. Church of the United [illegible], by their subscription, the sale and disposal of books, and the preaching of the Gospel, the Missionaries have not only [illegible] but they have succeeded greatly to admiration the cause of education, and a taste for [illegible] among a large number of the rising young. Hebrews, Jews and Christians have attended their schools, and have brought and read their books. Public worship is conducted in Arabic twice every Sunday and once in English. We had the pleasure of calling on one of the Missionaries, Rev. Mr. Fraser, Dr. Hamlin, the physician [illegible] on the Mission, paid us great attention; he is native of Nova Scotia. Damascus has 150,000 inhabitants.—120,000 Moslems, 15,000 Christians, 5,000 Jews and 10,000 Kurds. [illegible] we walked very often [illegible] and lane, we at last found ourselves [illegible]

Latest from Europe.

BY THE 'KANGAROO'

Savoy Annexed to France.

Visit of the Prince of Wales—Three men-of-war to accompany him.

VICTOR EMMANUEL EXCOMMUNICATED.

Broadstuffs Firm.

NEW YORK, April 6th.

The Kangaroo arrived this morning.

The annexation of Savoy to France was definitely settled by France and Sardinia, and the treaty signed.

The Reform Bill was being debated, but attracted little interest.

The London Times strongly recommends rumors that he makes a tour through the United States, and feels sure that a visit to the President would be appreciated.

Mrs. Jameson, the authoress, is dead.

Florence Nightingale is seriously ill.—Prayers were offered in the Garrison Chapel for her.

The Paris bourse was flat, but closed firmer at 67 to 69.

Signor Farini formally presented to the King of Sardinia the return of votes of the Æmilian Provinces in favour of annexation. The King in reply said he accepted the vote, as also that of the Romagna, but at the same time he would not fail in his deep devotedness to the Pope.

The Pope had addressed a monitory to Victor Emmanuel brushing off all relations with and excommunicating him.

It is reported that Piedmont wants a loan of a hundred and fifty million francs.

Austria declines renewing diplomatic intercourse with Sardinia, owing to her flagrant violation of the treaty of Zurich.

A Bombay telegram reports important alterations in the tariff, including ten per cent increased duty on twist and yarn.

COMMERCIAL INTELLIGENCE.

LIVERPOOL MARKETS.—Breadstuffs firm; flour 22s. a 29s. Wheat firm, with retail sales at 1d. in advance. Corn very dull; yellow 32s. 9d. a 33s. 3d. Provisions inactive, but no material change in prices. Lard rather easier. Ashes quiet, at 29s. 6d. for old pots.

LONDON MARKETS.—Breadstuffs firmer wheat slightly advanced. Money market active; consols 94¼ a 94⅝.

SECOND DESPATH.

The steamship Kangaroo, at 11 a. m., on the 21st ult., via Queenstown, on the 22nd, arrived this forenoon.

The Canadian sailed about the same time for Portland.

The Baltic was to sail on the 24th in place of the Jura, for Halifax and New York.

The Europa arrived at Liverpool on the evening of the 19th, and the Edinburgh at Queenstown, on the morning of the 21st.

The annexation of Savoy to France was generally regarded as an accomplished fact.

The London Times says that the Emperor Napoleon must be permitted to carry off his prey.

All the appointments of officials for Savoy had been completed in Paris.

A despatch from Vienna announces that Austria will pronounce herself against any violation of the rights of Swiss neutrality, guaranteed by the treaties of Great Britain.

A proposition in favor of ballot had been rejected by a large majority in both Houses of Parliament.

The Reform Bill was being debated, but attracted little interest.

The squadron to convey the Prince of Wales to Canada will consist of the screw steamers Hero, 91 guns; Ariadne, 26; Flying Fish, 6, and the Royal paddle yacht, Osborne.

The Mediterranean Telegraph Line will be completed in two months, when London will be in direct communication with Calcutta.

FRANCE.

According to the Paris correspondent of the London Post, the relations of France and England were not in a very satisfactory state.

The camp at Chalons, this year, is to consist of 60,000 men, under Marshal MacMahon.

The Paris correspondent of the Daily News says, it was reported that a French diplomatic manifesto would shortly appear, in which all the designs upon the Rhine frontier will be expressly disclaimed.

The reports that French troops were under orders for Savoy, were unfounded.

The provisions of the commercial treaty between England and France were in force and the exportation of French goods to England had commenced on a large scale.

Fourteen cent francs per sack lower in Paris flour.

LATEST.

LONDON, Wednesday.—Stock Market closed with better feeling to-day, owing to an improvement in the Paris bourse.

LATEST TO QUEENSTOWN.

LONDON, Thursday.—Markets checked yesterday owing to universal distrust of the growing policy of Napoleon.

The expected visit of the prince of Wales to Canada, and the expectations that he will make a tour to the United States, has attracted a favorable influence on most Canadian securities.

INDIA.

An insurrection of Kohnes had taken place at Tippenh. 1,000 persons were murdered. A rebellion is current at Indore, the capital of Holkar.

SPAIN AND MOROCCO.

In the last engagement before reported, the Spaniards had 250 killed and wounded. The Moors numbered 15,000, and the action lasted eleven hours. Another severe fight took place on the 7th, when the Spaniards finally victorious. Tangier was occupied by the Spaniards in four days.

The annexation council of Nice had voted against annexation to France, and sent a deputation to Turin on the subject.

Popular demonstrations had taken place at Pesth and other places in Hungary in commemoration of the revolution of 1848.

Nothing decisive had taken place relative to the annexation of Tuscany to Piedmont.

The Director of public debt at Rome had gone to Brussels to contract a loan of one million Scudos.

The La Nord says the account the Pope's bull is fulminated the allies of Milan, Genoa, Leghorn, Turin, Bologna, and Tuscany have appeal to Rome, and give a history of a natural subjection to the synod.

A grand conflagration took place at the Vatican on the 16th, it destroyed the Papal archives.

It was said at Vienna that the French troops at Rome would refuse to Cardinal Vicariel of the Pope excommunication Victor Emmanuel. Another report from Vienna is that the Neapolitan troops will at once seize the Papal States if the Pontiff refuses payment of the Romagna.

AUSTRIA.

It is stated that the French Ambassador had informed the Austrian government of the approaching evacuation of Lombardy by the French troops, and in the name of his government, expressed a wish that Austria would continue to observe non-intervention in the affairs of Central Italy.

BY THE "NIAGARA."

Halifax, April 5, 1860.

The "Niagara" left Liverpool at ten o'clock on the morning of the 24th, and Queenstown on the following day.

The "Baltic" was to leave Liverpool for Halifax and New York shortly arrive after the "Niagara," taking the place of the "Jura."

The "Edinburg," arrived at Liverpool on the morning of the 22nd.

The Paris Patrie says that the Sardinian troops had commenced the evacuation of Savoy, and that the first detachment of French troops returning from Lombardy would arrive at Savoy on the 25th March.

THE SAVOY QUESTION.

M. Thouvenel's last despatch to Count De Perigny, containing explanations for the British Government relative to the annexation of Savoy, was published on the 22nd. It contains but little not previously stated, points out the necessity for revision of the French frontiers, reiterates the Emperor's respect for existing treaties, claims this as purely exceptional cases, and shows that cession will be made without violence and free from all constraint. It concludes by expressing confidence that England will see that the situation of France has required the consummation of this project.

The Times admits that the annexation must be quietly allowed, but denounces the act as one of spoliation and wrong, and in principle as bad as the march upon the Rhine, or a sudden attempt upon Antwerp, and must leave upon all minds the conviction that there is no safety except in continual watchfulness and armed preparation against the aggressions of a sovereign who thus seizes upon the possessions of a friendly Power.

A Paris correspondent of the London Times says that all the Powers had replied to France relative to Savoy, and gives the following as the substance of them:—

Russia says that so long as the right of people to select is not put forward by France and as the present change does not affect the balance of power in Europe, what Sardinia may do with Savoy is no affair of hers.

Prussia says that, as the Emperor formally disavows the doctrine of natural frontiers, the transfer of Savoy is no business of hers.

Austria does not approve of annexation of the kind; but as Europe stood by when other annexations were effected, she does not see what she has to do with the Savoy annexation.

GREAT BRITAIN.

In the House of Commons the Savoy question was again debated and the conduct of the Government censured by several members.

ITALY.

The Council of State had decided that the concordat concluded by Austria with the Pope is not binding on Lombardy.

The Ex-Duke of Tuscany is preparing a protest against his fate.

AUSTRIA.

Continued agitation in Hungary, and numerous arrests at Pesth.

Le Nord says a reply to the British Government had reached Paris, and it was understood that it had not renounced all hope of preventing annexation, or, at least, of reducing it to propositions which would make it a constant source of embarrassment to France.

Baron Ricasoli reached Turin on the 22d March, and presented to the King the vote of Tuscany on the annexation question.

Prince Carignan was expected to proceed to Florence on the 26th March, not as Regent, but as the King's Governor of Tuscany.

A demonstration had taken place at Rome in honor of the birthday of Garibaldi.

The Swiss Charge d'Affairs at Vienna had presented to Count Rechberg a circular note, in which the Federal Council protests to the powers who guaranteed treaties to Vienna, against any measure having for its object the incorporation of Chamberlain and Faucigny with the French empire. Count Rechberg replied that Austria reserves her definitive reply until she has ascertained the disposition of Europe, but reminds the Charge that last year, when French troops were conveyed by railroad from Coblenz to Chambourg, the Austrian Cabinet in vain represented to Switzerland, as well as to the great Powers, that the neutrality of that part of Savoy should be respected by the passage of French troops, that neutrality was openly violated, contrary to the treaty of 1815.

Letters from Pesth report many arrests in that City.

Revolutionary proclamations are said to have been discovered by the police.

Many rifled cannon had been recently made in Austria, and, it is supposed, were to be sent to Venetia.

The Austrian Government was raising at home a new loan of two hundred million florins at five per cent interest, payable in fifty seven years by means of lottery drawing.

A young lady of eastern Savoy confidential friend recently addressed the following letter to her cousin:

DEAR KINSMAN: The mother who owns a cat kills, and I suppose others, yet is a widow. We is all well, and mother's got the ice Tuesday. Brother Tom has got the Measle Rash, and sister Susan has got a baby, and I hope there is here will find you in the same condition. Bile soon.

THE HANGING OF MRS. BILANSKY, IN ST. PAUL, MIN.

THE FIRST WOMAN EXECUTED IN THAT STATE.

Particulars of the Scene.

We learn from the St. Paul Pioneer of March 24th, that this unfortunate woman was hanged on Friday, the 23rd. The crime alleged against her was that of poisoning her husband on the 12th of March, 1859. Every effort had been made by her counsel to secure her acquittal, but without effect. She escaped once from the hall of the gaol, and, after a week's absence, was retaken with a person said to be her paramour. At the scaffold the following scene occurred in the presence of hundreds of persons, among whom were a number of Dacotah or Sioux Indians, who had come to witness this exhibition of Christian civilization:

When the prisoner arrived upon the platform, she was led forward and kneeled upon the drop, the gaoler, and Sisters of Charity and other ladies in the same posture around her. About five minutes were then spent in reading prayers by the clergy, in which she seemed to take a deep interest. Upon rising she was asked if she had anything to say. She said:

"I die without having had any mercy shown me, or justice. I die for the good of my soul, and not for murder. May you profit by my death. Your courts of justice are not courts of justice; but I will yet get justice in Heaven. I am a guilty woman, I know, but not of this murder, which was committed by another. I forgive everybody that did me wrong. I die a murdere to the law. I hope you all may be judged better than I have been, and by a more righteous judge. I die prepared to meet my God."

Mr. Miller, the Deputy Sheriff, then approached her with the rope, when she exclaimed:

"Dr. Miller, how can you stain your hands by putting that rope around my neck —the instrument of my death?"

He assured her that duty compelled him to do it, and she made no resistance, and only said:

"Do for God's sake, put it on so it will not suffocate me."

After it had been arranged, Dr. Miller took the black cap from his pocket, and proceeded to put it on her head, when she said:

"Be sure that my face is very well covered."

All this took place in less time than it will take to read it, during which she said several times:

"God have mercy—God have mercy on my soul."

Her last words were:—"Lord Jesus Christ, receive my soul."

She was requested to take a step forward on the drop, and then everything being prepared, Dr. Miller made a motion to Sheriff Tuttle, who pulled the fatal rope, and in an instant she fell. The fall was about four feet, and the machinery was so nicely adjusted that the noise was scarcely heard outside the inclosure.

There was scarcely any movement in the body after it dropped; a slight convulsive motion and a heaving of the chest, was all that was observed.

The body was allowed to hang about 20 minutes, during which time prayers were read audibly by the clergy who remained kneeling on the platform.

The physicians having examined the body several times, then stated to the Sheriff that life was extinct, and she was cut down and placed in a plain black coffin, that had been placed in front of the gallows during the whole period of the execution.

Her demeanor on the scaffold was excellent. She was not defiant or stoical, neither did she shed a tear. It is the opinion of many that she expected a pardon or reprieve to the last moment.

The most disgusting feature connected with the affair, says the Pioneer, was the eagerness and persistency with which females sought to obtain eligible places to view the dying agonies of one of their own sex.

DEATH OF JULLIEN.

[From the London Morning Chronicle, March 17th.]

It is with sincere regret we have to record the death of the universally popular M. Jullien, which occurred on Wednesday evening in the neighbourhood of Paris. For some weeks past the exertion and anxiety consequent on the getting up of a new series of concerts, upon which he calculated establishing in the French capital the high reputation he had gained in the course of twenty years in England, was too much for a temperament at all times keenly sensitive and excitable, and hen of success was the result. On Sunday last M. Jullien's first concert was to be given, and the greatest curiosity and interest prevailed throughout Paris. That first concert was never destined to take place. Two days previously M. Jullien was conveyed to a private lunatic Asylum, having exhibited the worst phases of madness, and his medical attendants entertained no hope whatever of a speedy cure. We have not ascertained particulars of his demise further than that in consequence of some severe course of antiphlogistic treatment, the patient caught a severe cold which festered on his lungs, and terminated in inflamation. M. Jullien's sisters returned some hours previous to his decease, and he passed away in perfect consciousness of what was passing around. The administration which was performed in a most impressive manner, and which in after days cannot fail to be a considerable ease, will, he appreciated by his widow and family, and the numerous attending his illness and death.

THE RETROSPECT AND PROSPECTS OF BRITISH NORTH AMERICA.

What concerning the present condition and prospects of a country, whether it be self-governed or a dependency, the natural inquiry will invariably suggest itself, "what are its antecedents?" We have just perused with pleasure a statistical review of the internal improvements and varied progressive condition of Canada: what many of our grand-fathers destroyed must ever be a source of bitterness, has therefore by the untiring zeal and enterprize of its Anglo-Canadian inhabitants, a Highway of Civilization. We do not (amid the turmoil of our own more immediate social and political interests) sufficiently appreciate the influence of science in our North American dependencies. The Grand Trunk Railway, now drawing near its completion, and destined shortly to unite with our long link of iron the shores of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, is one great palpable feature in this advance; but the uniting of numerous less known undertakings of the same order, that have, or are now, in course of construction, and destined to be equally useful, but less of romance was the result. On Sunday last M. Jullien's first concert was to be given, and the greatest curiosity and interest prevailed throughout Paris. That first concert was never destined to take place. Two days previously M. Jullien was conveyed to a private lunatic Asylum, having exhibited the worst phases of madness, and his medical attendants entertained no hope whatever of a speedy cure. We have not ascertained particulars of his demise further than that in consequence of some severe course of antiphlogistic treatment, the patient caught a severe cold which festered on his lungs, and terminated in inflamation. The administration which was performed in a most impressive manner, and which in after days cannot fail to be a considerable ease, will, he appreciated by his widow and family, and the numerous attending his illness and death.

AND upwards save to the Farmers, by Aldus Mowry's

CHOP CRINDER.

This Machine has just been patented, and has great advantages over any other for the same purpose, now known or in use. It is so simple that any farmer can use it, and it requires but a small amount of power to drive it, two horse power being sufficient; with this amount of power of any kind, it will grind from 12 to 25 bushels of Oats per hour. The grain is ground or rather cut by cast-steel cutters, which are so fitted into the Machine, that they can easily be taken out and repaired at a trifling cost.

All sorts of Grain can be ground without altering or adjusting the Machine.

PRICE $60.

All orders directed to "A. Mowry, Ashburnham, Peterborough," will be promptly attended to.

PHONOGRAPHY,
or
WRITING BY SOUND!!

PHONOGRAPHY was invented by ISAAC PITMAN, of Bath, England, in the year 1837. It is the most simple, most natural, most rapid, and most easily learned system of writing which has ever been, or ever can be invented.

During the past fifteen years, hundreds of thousands of persons, in England and America, in both public and private life, have learned to write Phonography, and thousands of social and business letters annually pass through the post office.

Nor is the great popularity to be wondered at. The present system of writing is exceedingly cumbersome, and totally unworthy these days of progress and invention. Phonography is equally as legible, can be learned in one twentieth the time, and can be written six times as fast! In other words, the labor of six days can be performed in one—one man can do the work of six. So simple is the system, too, that a person may learn to write it slowly, in a couple of hours. A hour's daily practice for a few weeks will enable any person to write Phonography with certainty, and with some degree of freedom. The same amount of practice continued for six months will enable a person to take reports of speeches, lectures, sermons, or conversation, and to read them with accuracy.

The late Hon. Thos. H. Benton, upon being presented with a verbatim report of one of his masterly speeches, taken by a little boy only twelve years of age, said; "How this art has been known 40 years ago it would have saved me 20 years' hard labor." The learned senator spoke but a portion of the truth. Almost any hand requires six years to accomplish, Phonography will perform in one.

To clergymen, Editors, Physicians, Lawyers, Secretaries, Conveyancers, Law and Medical Students, Lecturers, Printers, School Teachers, Merchants, School Boys and Girls, a knowledge of Phonography is of vast utility. In fact there is no profession or calling in which it is not useful, and no young man's education can be considered complete without it.

During the past 9 months hundreds of persons in Canada, of every pursuit in life, have acquired the Art, from many of whom the subscriber has received neatly-written phonographic letters, expressive of their delight with the attainment, and the extraordinary ease with which they have acquired it.

For the purpose of aiding in the dissemination of so important a reform in its own country, the subscriber is now prepared to supply all who apply, with the MANUAL OF PHONOGRAPHY, and the PHONOGRAPHIC COPY BOOK, sent by mail to any part of the Province, postage pre-paid, for the small sum of TWENTY-FOUR CENTS.

Anybody and everybody who can learn anything, can learn PHONOGRAPHY from the MANUAL without other assistance. Those who wish to be able to put their thoughts to paper at the rate of from 100 to 250 words per minute, should send for the above-mentioned works at once. The [illegible] of Phonography is easy to understand. [illegible] is easy to understand.

ALBION HOTEL,
MONTREAL.
L. W. BECKER, Proprietor.
IS pleasantly situated at the head of ST. PAUL STREET, amongst the largest wholesale houses in the city. It has (with business men generally, and especially with the best Merchants of both Provinces) become so great a favorite, that it is now acknowledged to be THE Business Hotel of Montreal. To meet the extensive increase, during the last year in the business of the house, the proprietor has built a large addition. The Dining Room has been extended and made more commodious; there have been completed in the new wing, a great number of well-ventilated sleeping rooms, and the House throughout has been refitted, and now contains many improvements and conveniences hitherto unknown to its genre. The whole of the beds have, at great expense, been furnished with NEW SPRING MATTRASSES. The Proprietor expects that by continuing his personal management of the concern, THE ALBION, to say the least of it, will continue to be, as it now is, the best Dollar and a half Hotel in Canada.

FAREWELL WINTER.

Farewell winter—do not linger—
Yield thy throne to gentle spring;
Touch not with thine icy finger
The dewy sparklet on her wing.
See, the tender buds are bursting,
And naked is the hill and plain,
Hear what pleasant sounds are rushing
From the rivlets free again.

Leave us with thy looks so dreary—
Take thy fetters from our seas;
Of thy frowns and harshness weary,
Welcome now spring's genial breeze,
With the rule of that fair creature,
That with timid step appears,
Robed in green, each changing feature,
Smiling now, and now in tears.

Like a noble spirit bending
To a stronger power than thine,
Yield thy realms without contending,
Crown and sceptre now resign.
Leave us, winter, wherefore linger,
Vain is now thy wish to stay;
Hoary Time with becoming finger
Calleth thee from earth away.

The Faithful Friend.

It was a wild night on the western coast of Ireland, the sea moaned and dashed against the high cliffs that hung over the dark water. The moon shining fitfully through a driving sack of clouds, betokened a storm at hand. A light streaming from the unshaded windows of a small cottage, some distance from the shore, revealed to the passers-by a small, pleasant apartment, lighted by the bright rays of a fire burning on the grate, showing in its fitful beams, now rising, now falling, two fair young matrons, alike, and yet unlike, in their sisterly beauty. The elder of the two, a fair, gentle blue-eyed woman, with that charming blending of the fair Saxon-type, with the high-bred, delicate style of Norman beauty, contrasted well with the darker beauty of the younger lady. A dark, hazel eye, slightly aquiline nose, and haughty curve of the upper lip, combined with a tall, lithe form, gave evidence, to a close observer, of a spirit that is unusually supposed to be possessed by woman.

"Close the shutters, Nora, and light the lamp; and now, Carrie, we will sew, and have a talk of old times, and of all that has happened since I left home. Dear mother, I can see her now, sitting in her old corner by the fire, and thinking of us all;" and with these words the younger sister drew her chair by the work-table, that stood in the centre of the room.

"I have had no time to talk to you before Henry left us, since your arrival."

"But, Georgiana," said the other, as she followed her example, "can you feel easy when you know Henry may fall in with those horrid smugglers?"

"True for you, marm," said the pretty Nora, who had lingered in the room, "for I saw black Maurice Mccirath go by just at the gloaming, and it was an ill meaning he had in his eye as he looked at the window; it's such as he that brings a bad name on Old Ireland."

"Never fret, Nora," said her mistress, laughing, "Rover will take care of his master; and here are my pretty playthings to defend you from black Maurice;" and she drew a brace of pistols from a drawer in the table and laid them in her basket.

"You look frightened, Carrie. You do not suppose you will have occasion to use them," said her sister, shrinking from the table with womanly apprehension. "I had not thought you were exposed to any danger, whatever Henry might be."

"Nor have I been as yet," answered the other, "but this Maurice, whom Nora mentioned, is the supposed leader of the band of smugglers collected in this country, and has been heard to threaten Henry for his vigilance in their detection; he might at any time take it into his evil mind to visit the house, but I hope not while you are here, if the mere thought of it would make you look so pale."

So spoke the young wife of Lieutenant Henry Moreton, as active officer on the preventive service. It was as his wife had said, Maurice McGrath, or as he was better known, black Maurice, the native, but secret leader of a gang of desperadoes, had sworn an oath of bitter vengeance against the lieutenant for his active discharge of duty.

On this particular night Henry had received information of a valuable cargo to run on shore a few miles from his dwelling, and calling Rover, a huge Newfoundland dog, who never willingly stirred from his side, hastened to join his men, after lingeringly bidding his wife take care of her sister, who had arrived that day from their old home, and, if she were besieged in her castle, to defend it to the last.

"What is it?" said Mrs. Moreton, as an exclamation from Nora of "Holy Virgin, defend us!" drew her eyes to the window, on which the girl's gaze seemed riveted, while every vestige of color had disappeared from her usually rosy cheeks.

She there beheld the cause for alarm, for she appeared, at the small, circular opening in the shutter, a dark glowing eye, that she was sure belonged to no one but the redoubted Maurice.

A hoarse laugh showed that he knew he was discovered, and immediately a succession of heavy blows fell on the door that led from the vine-covered porch to the room in which they were sitting.

"Silence, girl," said she, seizing Nora by the arm and forcing her into a chair; "this is no way to meet them."

Poor Nora's screams stopped suddenly, from fear of the flashing eye and stern tones of her mistress.

"Cheer up, Caroline, we are not beat yet; if they try to enter I have here the death warrant of two of them; and if Henry is not two far away, the report will speedily bring his men to our aid.

Thus she spoke, striving to cheer her almost fainting sister, who, with lips and cheeks pale as the dead, clung to her trembling, while the heightened color in her own cheeks, her dark eye flashing, and her mouth firm drawn for its full height, showed that her heroic spirit dwells not alone in the slender form of hers. In a pause in the storm of blows, she demanded what they wanted, in tones as firm as if no danger was near.

"And it's yourself that knows well that is your husband we are wanting," said a rough voice, with an oath; and, if you do not want your house torn down over your head, my lady, you will open to us, for we'll have him this night."

"He is not here," answered she; "and if he were, do you think it is my hand that would undo the door to those who would be his murderers? He is away, and I tell you Maurice McGrath, it is but short work he will make of you if he returns and finds you besieging the door of his dwelling."

"Come on, boys," said the enraged ruffian; "bring that billet of wood and we will soon have the door down, and then a short shift and a sure cord for the lieutenant."

Amid the noise of blows that fell on the door Mrs. Moreton seated her sister, and sat down beside her, looking carefully to her pistols, feeling sure the heavy oaken door could not long withstand the hurricane that was pealing on it. As she anticipated the upper panael soon gave way, giving to view the angry looks of several men that had glared on them through the opening.

"Maurice," said she, still retaining her seat, as the ruffian advanced his hand towards the lock, "set your foot over the threshold and die. I hold the life of you and another in my hand."

"Shoot her," said one, rising his pistol as he spoke; but their leader beat it down before he could take aim.

"Hold your hand!" he shouted; faith she is a brave lady; and by the saints no one shall harm her; give us your word," said he, with a look of respectful admiration, that your husband is not in the house, and we will go."

"I give you my word," said the undaunted woman, that he went away before sunset to look for you."

"And may the Lord have mercy on him," said Maurice, if he finds me to-night, he'll never see the blessed sun again. He has done us mischief enough." And muttering threats of vengeance he withdrew.

It was a weary vigil kept by them amid the storm that soon came over the heaving billows, but just before the wished for dawn the short quick bark of Rover told of the welcome arrival of the absent husband, and they hastened to take down the temporary barrier they had erected before the door and admit him. He little thought how his return had been longed for that weary night.

"How is this," said he, as he sank exhausted on the sofa. "Have those villain's been here?" But what he would have said was cut short by their exclamations of dismay at his appearance. And well they might exclaim. Pale as death, tatters, his sword gone, his coat rent in many places, and his whole appearance showed that he had been engaged in a violent struggle. In their questions of what had befallen him, he insisted on first hearing the cause of what he saw before him. "Maurice McGrath," said he, with a darkening brow, as they told him of the last night's outrage, "a day of reckoning will come for you yet; and trust me, it shall not be long first." "My brave wife," said he, as he folded her in his arms, "when you insisted on joining me in my wild life I warned you of this, but I little thought it would come so soon. You must return with your sister for a while, to your quiet home."

"And do you think, Henry, that I will leave you? trust me," answered she proudly "your honor will never be compromised by my idle fears; it is in my keeping."

"I know it," said he, with a look of admiring love; "and if you will remain, so be it. Now, if Carrie will take that wild look out of her eyes, and sit down by Nora and I, get me some hot coffee, to take the chill out of my bones, I will tell you all that has happened to me. If it had not been for this good fellow," laying his hand on Rover's head, "I should never have seen your face again. When I parted from you, and joined my men, I was told that since I saw them they had information that the cargo would be landed near the village below here, though this was told them, I believe to get me separated from them more easily. When I had posted them advantageously, and had given somewhat in advance of them to see if I could make out, with my glass any signs of the vessel, I was met by a boy who told me he could show me a place in the rocks where the smugglers had stowed away a former cargo.

I hesitated, and half turned back to call some of the men; but seeing Rover by my side, and placing my pistols ready in my belt, I followed him. It was now dark, and as we neared the cliff, I noticed to my astonishment, that Rover had left me. I turned to see what had become of him, when I was seized from behind, a gag was placed in my mouth, and I was dragged to the edge of the cliff, where a consultation was held as to how I should be disposed of.—"Throw him over the cliff," said one." and then there will be no blood spilt, and I warrant the tide will take him safely out to sea—a merry voyage to him; give me my handkerchief first; he will go safe enough without that;" and he snatched it roughly from my mouth. I seemed to beg my life of the wretches, and knew, too, that it would be unavailing. What thoughts surged through my mind as they prepared to cast me into the dark waters that heaped up eager for their prey.

The thought of you both, sitting here, so unconscious of my fate, was bitter enough, but I had no space for reflection. Luckily my arms were not bound, and, as they hurled me over, I instinctively straightened myself, and the waves closed over my head, as I went down fast foremost. Had I fallen on my side every bone in my body would have been broken. When I came to my senses, I found my head above the water, by Rover, who had swum with me under the shadow of the cliff. I was too weak, for some time, to make any effort; but, when at last, I tried to make for the rocks he resisted every attempt. I thought it possible the smugglers had my companion in the neighborhood, and yielded to his instinct.

When I at length gained the rocks I was too benumbed with cold, for some time, to ascend the difficult path; and knowing that nothing further could be done that night, I came home first, knowing the men will soon be here to give you tidings of my disappearance.

"Ah, Rover," said his fair mistress, as she laid her face on his shaggy head, "little did I think, when you went out last evening, you would prove so true a friend;" and the bright tears fell over his long curls as he looked up in her face with that strangely human expression these race of dogs so often wear in their eyes.

A knock at the door interrupted them, and, on opening it, they saw the uniform of a blockade man, who came to report to Mrs Moreton the mysterious disappearance of their officer. His astonishment may be imagined when he saw him there, though in a very dilapidated condition. He went away in happier mood, and cautioned to say nothing to any one of finding him safe at home. Mrs. Wharton returned home next day, telling her sister that, though she thought her resolution for remaining with her husband was right, she had not courage to go through any more such scenes; another such a night would kill her.

The first letter she received from Mr Moreton gave an account of the capture of the smugglers the second night after her departure for home. The sudden appearance of one among them, who they believed to be dead, disheartened them, and they made hardly any resistance, with the exception of black Maurice, who, refusing quarter, died fighting desperately. The recital of facts goes far to prove truth is stranger than fiction.

RUSTIC SIMPLICITY.

A NEWLY MARRIED MAN IN AN UNPLEASANT PREDICAMENT.

Day before yesterday a trio of newly-wedded couples from the interior of Kentucky arrived at the Burnet House, and took apartments for the night in that well-ordered hotel. It was quite evident that the entire party were unfamiliar with metropolitan sights. The roomy corridors, marble floor, gorgeous drawing room, and well-spread table of the hotel drew from them the most ingenuous remarks of surprise. In the evening they visited the opera-house, and were so astonished by its magnificence that even Mrs. Waller's wonderful impersonation of "Meg Merrilies" almost failed to interest them.

Nothing more was thought of the verdant trio till about 1 o'clock yesterday morning, at which hour the boot-black of the Burnet House, in making his customary round, observed one of the bucolic Benedicts seated in the hall, near the door of his room. He naively asked the polisher of understandings if he was the clerk. Receiving a negative answer, he informed the boot-black that he would like to see that individual. In a few moments one of the attentive office men was at his side and politely asked what was needed.

"Could you make me a bed in the parlor?" said the disconsolate-looking individual.

"In the parlor?" echoed the clerk. "I am afraid not."

"Well, I'd like to have one spread down some'ers."

"Why don't you go into your own room?" asked the clerk.

"I don't like to," said the bashful young man.

"What's the matter?" continued the clerk, "has your wife turned you out?"

"No," said he, drawlingly; "but, you see, I've never been married before, and I don't much like to go in, partickler in a strange place."

"Oh, go right in," said the clerk smiling, audibly. "She won't think it wrong."

Here the door of his room opened about an inch, and through the aparture came a coaxing voice, saying:

"Do go no in, John. I won't hurt yer. I know'd they'd think strange of your standin' out there. Come in won't yer? I've done, blow'd out the gas, and it's all dark."

The odor from the room assured the clerk that she had indeed "blow'd" out the gas, so, pushing open the door, he stopped the flow, raised a window, and returned to the hall to persuade the verdant husband to retire with his wife. All argument was fruitless, however, and he was compelled to assign the simple individual to a separate room for the night.—Cincinnatti Inquirer, March 23.

RICH SCENE.

The following amusing scene, says the [illegible]ner, occurred at the meeting of the "admission board" on Wednesday. It rose out of an application to the Workhouse made by a poor old woman, named Bradley, who had with her a child which she stated was her grandchild, and which she wished to be admitted with her. The woman had been an inmate of the house from the famine of 1847 up to a fortnight back, when she left on hearing that her son had enlisted in the line, in order to take this child away from its step-mother, whom she feared was ill-treating it. She went to Mallow, where the step-mother was living with her relatives, and having got possession of the child returned to Cork, and now sought admission to the workhouse. Mr. Jameson, who had before him the relieving officers book in which her name appeared, refused to admit her, desiring her to get the father of the child to support it. As the poor woman was leaving the room she met Mr. Sheehan, and told her case to him, in the hope that he would have more compassion for her.

Mr. Jameson—Don't mind that woman, down there.

Mr. Sheehan—We will mind her, sir. We will mind the poor woman.

Mr. Jameson (angrily)—Turn the woman out, I say.

Mr. Sheehan—Turn her out, sir. We'll not turn her out, sir; and why should we turn her out, sir? Faith, that's a good one.

Mr. Jameson—Go 'long you blackguard scoundrel; I will turn yourself out of the room.

Mr. Sheehan—Go 'long you ruffian you; I'd like to see you do it.

This retort irritated Mr Jameson to such an extent that he jumped up and rushed towards Mr. Sheehan, who also got up and advanced to meet him, and blows would certainly have been exchanged had not Mr. I. Julian and Mr. S. Flanagan come between the gentlemen, and restrained them.

Mr. Jameson (surrounded by him[illegible] and in a high state of excitement)—I'd kick you out, you blackguard.

Mr. Sheehan—You're a blackguard yourself, and a d—n blackguard. Be G—, for talking to a poor woman there he called me a blackguard scoundrel.

Mr. Jameson—And you are a blackguard scoundrel.

Mr. Sheehan made a hasty movement towards Mr. Jameson, but was stopped by some of those in the room.

Mr. Jameson you are a blackguard,

Mr. Sheehan—Well, did any one ever hear the like of that? For hearing what a poor old woman had to say, he says I am a blackguard and ought to be turned out.

Mr. Jameson—You should be turned out, you scoundrel—you blackguard.

Mr. Sheehan—If you were the Lord Lieutenant, I wouldn't allow you to say that; I am not a blackguard.

Mr. Jameson—You are a blackguard, and you should be turned out.

Mr. Sheehan—Go 'long, you blackguard ruffian you.

Mr. Jameson—Get out, you low ruffian.

Mr Sheehan—You're a common ruffian.

Mr. Jamesoe—You are a dame blackguard, I say.

Mr. Sheehan—And you are dame blackguard. By G—— you'd starve all Ireland if you could.

Mr. Jameson declining to reply to this last observation, the affair terminated, and the business of the day proceeded with.

THE HANDSOME GIRL OF PARIS.

The Droit has the following:—A person residing at Bourg-la-Reine, near Paris, is father of a remarkably handsome girl, whose name is Olympe; but unfortunately the damsel at an early age went astray, and abandoned her family. He sought her out, and had her placed in the convent of the Dames St. Michael, where she spent some time. Hoping that she was reformed, he took her home, but six months ago she again left, and all his efforts to discover her were unavailing. Happening to be in Paris, he fell in with the procession of the Bœuf Gras. His first movement was to turn aside to avoid it, but after a little hesitation he remained to see it pass. In the car he perceived with surprise that the damsel who was personating Venus strongly resembled his runaway daughter; but he could not get near enough to be sure that it was she. He therefore accompanied the cortege, and penetrated with it into the courtyard of Baron de Rothschild, where it stopped. There he saw clearly that the Venus was no other than his Olympe. He went at once to the commissary police of the district, and asked him, in virtue of the paternal authority, to arrest the girl; but the commissary observed that to do so would create trouble and scandal, and that it would be better to wait at the slaughter-house of Popincourt for the return of the procession, when Venus, becoming mortal, could be taken into custody quietly. The father consented, and, when the procession arrived, he pounced on the girl. She was much annoyed, but what appeared to make more impression on her than her father's anger, was that she could not go to a masked ball in her fine dress.—"O father!" she cried," only let me go to the ball as Venus, and to-morrow I will return home." But the obdurate parent had her carried off to a house of correction, and there she will have to remain three months.

Some author tells us that "much is said about the tongue." True, the thing is in everybody's mouth.

"Give me a kiss, dear girl."

"I can't," she replied; "I don't mind lending you one, but I must have it returned to-morrow!"

How to make people acknowledge the corn. Tread on their toes.

"Aint you afraid you will break, while doing so?" said a chap in the pit of a circus to the clown.

"Why so?" asked the clown.

"Because you are a tumbler," handed the wag.

The house was in a roar. Exit clown behind the scenes.

PERSEVERANCE.

He who allows his application to falter, or shirks his work on frivolous pretexts, is on the sure road to ultimate failure. Let any task be undertaken as a thing not possible to be evaded, and it will soon come to be performed with alacrity and cheerfulness. The habit of strenuous, continued labor, will become comparatively easy in time, like every other habit. Then even men with the commonest brains and the most slender powers will but apply themselves wholly and indefatigably to one thing at a time.

Sir Charles Napier, when in India, encountered an army of 45,000 Beloochies with 2,000 men, of whom only 400 were Europeans. He charged them in the center up a high bank, and for three hours the battle was undecided. At last they turned and fled.

It is this sort of pluck, tenacity, and determined perseverance which wins soldiers' battles, and indeed, every battle. It is the one each nearer that wins the race and the blood; the one pull more of the oar that proves the "toughness of the fellow," as Oxford men say; it is the one march more that wins the campaign; the fire a minute more persistent courage that wins the fight.—Though your force be less than another's, you equal and outmaster your opponent if you continue it longer and consecrate it more. The reply of the Spartan father, who said to his son, when complaining that his sword was too short, "Add a step to it," is applicable to everything in life.

It is not how much a man may know that is of so much importance as the end and purpose for which he knows it. The object of knowledge should be to mature wisdom and improve character, to render us better, happier, and more useful—more benevolent, more energetic, and me a efficient in the pursuit of every high purpose in life. We must ourselves be and do, and not rest satisfied merely with reading and meditating over what other men have written and done. Our best light must be made life, and our best thought action. The humblest and least liberate guest trains his sense of duty, and accustoms himself to an orderly and diligent life. Though talents are the gift of nature, the highest virtue may be acquired by men of the humblest abilities, through careful self-discipline. At least we ought to be able to say, as Richter did, "I have made as much out of myself as could be made of the stuff, and no man should require more."—Self-Help.

ENGLISH TREES AND BIRDS IN NEW ZEALAND.

The following extract from a letter of Mr. W. Brodie, of Eastbourne, Sussex, which appeared a few months since in the Home News is very interesting:—"I believe I was the first colonist that succeeded in importing the English pheasant, the golden pheasant, and the partridge into New Zealand. On Nov. 8, 1845 (in elsewhere says, "Birds should not be sent out between March and September; these best in April or May are sure to pine away and die, to hang their pairing season,") I left the St. Katherine's Dock, in the ship "Ralph Bardpal," bound for Auckland, New Zealand, with thirty-six pheasants and partridges on board, and, after a long and disagreeable voyage of 251 days, landed in Auckland on Aug. 10, 1846, with the same number of pheasants and partridges that I left England with (thirty-six). It is a pastime to cabin passengers going a long voyage to have some occupation to break the monotony of shipboard imprisonment. I therefore looked after my own birds, cleaned them out every morning, gave them fresh red gravel (coarse) every other day, supplied them beautifully with fresh water (not water caught on deck after a heavy rain, as there is a certain quantity of tar in it,) never allowed them a fresh water bath, fed them with buck-wheat, canary-seed, and hempseed alternately week and week about, kept them in wicker cages made on purpose, three feet long, two feet wide, and one foot high and padded the top inside the lids of the cages to protect their heads.

These birds were kept on deck the whole of the voyage, with a painful exercise over to protect them from the salt water in bad weather. Hence my success. The increase of my birds has amounted to tens of thousands. In the weather part of New Zealand they breed twice a-year, and they have stocked the province of Auckland 200 miles distant from the point where they were first sent adrift, which was upon one of my estates, near the North Cape of New Zealand. Again early part of 1850 I sent out 600 hares and hedge sparrows and yellow hammers in the Flying Fish, to Auckland; and I hope in September to send out 400 singing birds to the same port gratuitously. Since I have been in New Zealand I have imported into that colony no less than 140,000 English forest-trees from England, which have been planted from Invercargill, the southernmost settlement in the south Island. It is quite useless for emigrants to take any further trouble in introducing the forest trees of England in New Zealand, as they may obtain trees there of cuttings from the produce of the parent trees which I have imported.

"He's a young man after my own heart," said a lady to a caller, of one who had just passed

EXECUTIONER JOHN CRIMMINS.

From the Penn York Tribune.

On Friday morning, at 25 minutes after o'clock, John Crimmins, Angel Entry Mowry, was hanged in the county jail. The following letter was written by the executioner a night, who proved to have an intimate friend.

The next instant the trapdrop fell with a dull thud, and the prisoner was launched into eternity. The fall broke the neck of Crimmins, and he died without a struggle. The body was cut down at 9 o'clock, and delivered to the undertaker, Mr. Russell Gardner, who prepared it for burial. The remains were taken to the late residence of the deceased, No. 4 Pine street, where they will be interred this afternoon at 2 o'clock. The funeral will be strictly private.

The following letter was written by Crimmins to his wife, and was received by her on the morning of the execution:

"City Prison, March 24, 1860.

"To Captain Dowling, Esq.,

"Dear Sir:—I think it my duty to inform you of the interest you have taken in my behalf. God bless you for your kindness. I am satisfied there is no hope for me in this world, and I am willing to die. I have no fear of death, when I consider by the good deeds I have done in this life I shall be received into the bosom of my Father in Heaven. I die with the best wishes to the good people of New York, for I have seen more friendship since I have been in prison, than I ever saw before. I am very sorry to leave my dear wife and children, but I hope they will be taken care of by the people of New York. I am very sorry that I have not been able to repay you for your kindness to me, but I hope you will accept my heartfelt thanks. Give my love to all my friends, and tell them to meet me in Heaven. Tell Mr. Russell to take my body to Mr. Gardner's, No. 4 Pine street, and I hope he will see that it is decently interred. Tell Mr. Gardner to have a nice coffin made for me, and to have me buried in the Catholic burying ground, Calvary. Tell Mr. Gardner to have a nice hearse and carriage to take my body to the grave who delivered an address in Gaelic which was received with rapturous applause.

Mr. Hagel then addressed the meeting in English.

Mr. Buck gave a very clear outline of the origin, progress, and successful administration of the Pope's temporal power—stigmatised as a most ruinous principle that doctrine avowed by some European Powers, viz., that a people had the right, whosoever guided by caprice or bad passions, to change their rulers or form of government; and concluded an able address by saying that if such a principle became practical, some who are now living might pay homage to a king of Cork in his own native cherished country. The Resolution was seconded by Mr. Joseph Shaw, and on being put from the Chair was carried with acclamation.

Mr. Hafley moved the 5th Resolution. The Resolution was seconded by Mr. Joseph Shaw, and carried unanimously.

Mr. John Maloney moved the 6th Resolution. The Resolution was seconded by Mr. Sentry, and carried with acclamation.

Mr M'Gillis then moved that Rev. Mr Kelly leave the Chair, and that Mr. Buck be called thereto, and that a vote of thanks be given to Rev Mr Kelly for the able manner in which he filled the chair.

The Resolution was seconded by Mr. Sentry. The vote of thanks was tendered and passed with acclamation.

I have the honor to be, Mr. Editor,
Your obedient servant,
EDWIN P. FORD,
Secretary.

ARRIVAL OF SOLDIERS FROM INDIA.

GREAT MORTALITY AMONG THE MEN.

(From the European Times, March 17.)

On Wednesday the clipper-ship Great Tasmania, belonging to Messrs. James Baines & Co.'s Black Ball line of Australian packets, arrived in the Mersey from Calcutta in 114 days, having left that port on the 21st November last. The Great Tasmania had on board 1,101 passengers consisting of 20 officers, 973 soldiers, 17 women, 23 children; together with three officers' wives, two children, and two servants. The soldiers were all belonging to the hon. East India Company's service, who refusing to be transferred to her Majesty's army, had insisted on coming home. For this purpose the Great Tasmania was chartered by the competent authorities in India, and the men and women were shipped on board of her. From some cause or other, it is said that proper arrangements had not been made for their accommodation, and that the provisions were bad in quality, and altogether inadequate to the requirements of so long a voyage. Sickness of a malignant character broke out on board, and somewhere about sixty died on the passage. When the vessel arrived in the river there were considerably upwards of a hundred of the men sick, and on Thursday night 100 were taken to the workhouse in Brownlow-hill in cars and spring carts. One was found dead in a car when taken to the workhouse, and one died between Thursday night and yesterday morning. Twenty-seven more were taken to the workhouse in the course of yesterday, and one was not expected to survive the night. The diseases by which they are said to have been attacked are scury in a malignant form, and fever. The men complain that the provisions were very bad; that the lime juice with which they were supplied was worthless; and that they were fearfully short of hammocks and sleeping accommodation. Who is to blame, it is not easy to say, but the poor fellows presented a sad spectacle as they were carted along the streets towards Brownlow-hill; it is said that the shipowners had nothing to do with the provisioning of the soldiers, but merely contracted for their passage at a per capita sum per head. There can be no doubt that an investigation will be made into all the particulars by the competent authorities, and till this is done it would be highly improper to offer any opinion on the merits of this very painful case.

The Late Marshal Reille.

(From the Times.)

The boyhood of the soldier who but a few days ago lived to tell his own adventures was spent under the old regime of France. He only missed by a month or two being under Louis XV., and he actually saw the whole reign of the unfortunate sovereign who perished on a scaffold. He could perfectly remember the Assembly of Notables at Versailles, and, as far as his age went, might have played a part in any of the scenes through which the revolution was conducted. As soon, indeed, as those famous wars commenced, which turned the passions of democratic France towards views of foreign conquest, the military services of young Reille commenced also, nor did they terminate until the swords of all nations, after twenty years of conflict, were once more sheathed. It is here that the story presents so incredible an aspect. Napoleon had many generals, and they were all working men, but no officer of the grand army could have shown, we believe, an amount of service so extraordinary as that performed by Reille. He was not in Egypt, and he escaped the disastrous expedition to Moscow, but with these exceptions he appears to have been fighting and commanding in every country through which the French eagles were carried. He fought against the Duke of Brunswick, against Suwarrow, against Wurmser, against the Archduke Charles, against Mina, against Hill, and against Wellington. He fought in Belgium, in Italy, in Germany, in Spain and in Flanders. He began his campaigns as a subaltern of infantry under Dumouriez, and ended them in command of a corps d'armées at Waterloo. His ubiquity seems to have brought him into every episode of the war, however secular. He assisted at the siege of Toulon, penetrated the blockade at Genoa, held command in the camp of Boulogne, watched the great leagues of Strasbourg on the part of the Emperor, and was actually on board ship at one of Villeneuve's sailings. He was in the campaign of Valmy when the French, unconscious of their own power, were protecting their own frontier. He was in three of Montesotte, of Zurich, of Jena, of Eylau, of Wagram, of the Pyrenees; and, after a career of services in the Peninsula alone, which would have sufficed to create a military reputation, he bore a brave and distinguished part in the Hundred Days, and finally covered Paris with his division against the last advance of the allies. From the year 1792 to the year 1815 he can be traced from place to place, always in a post of danger, usually in one of trust, and yet, after vicissitudes of fortune unparalleled in the perils of this eventful period, he survived in peace and quiet to our own days; and witnessed, after an interval of half a century, the development of a second empire. It provokes a smile of incredulity or astonishment to read of a man whose retirement from political life had commenced before George [illegible] and whose name of our present Sovereign were born. General Reille was 45 years of age when he with drew, certainly a fair share of experience, from the strife and struggles of the world; but so little had his vital powers been injured by the strain, that 50 years more remained to him. During this period he received the honours which formed the natural lot of such dignified ease. Louis Philippe made him marshal of France a few days before the roll of those dignitaries was diminished by the death of Oudinot, and the usual accompaniments of place and distinctions were, of course, at his command. His distinctions, in fact, were too genuine to be overlooked under any kind of government. Legitimists and Orleanists alike were fain to recognize the deserts of a life like his. He had contributed to the glories of France, and in those glories every Frenchman was a participator.

The Wier Rape Case.

Not a few, prompted by curiosity or from more worthless motives, repaired to the county town to witness the trial of the alleged rape case which was expected to come off at Stratford this week. Indeed so great was the interest manifested that for many days previous to the opening of the court it was impossible to obtain a room or a bed in the respectable hotels of the town. Weir has offered all the atonement possible under the circumstances, having married the young woman whose esteem and confidence he abused. The circumstances under which the alleged crime of rape was committed are already familiar to the public, as well as the subsequent steps which were taken to arrest Weir and their failure. The sequel only remains to be told.

We have reason to believe that neither Mr Weir nor Miss Christie wished the case to come to trial, and that only for the interference of third parties this marriage would have taken place at the outset, thus sparing a worthy family an amount of affliction of which the outer world can form no adequate idea, and depriving the public of a source of scandal which, it must be admitted, they have fed greedily upon during the past few months.

The marriage was brought about by a letter from Mr. Weir to Miss Christie, protesting that his intentions were honorable from the first, however much circumstances might appear against him, and that he was still willing to marry her if she would go to Buffalo where he was then residing. In consequence of this letter and other evidences of his sincerity, the young woman and her brother started for Buffalo on Saturday last. Mr Weir true to his promise, upon finding that Miss Christie was still willing to marry him, caused the marriage to be solemnized on Monday last, at Buffalo, in the presence of the British Consul, the brother of the young woman, a high official of one of the American Courts, and two respectable residents of this village. Mr. Weir returned to Toronto with his bride on Tuesday.—St. Mary's Argus.

THE PRINCE OF WALES A PRISONER.

Considerable amusement has been afforded at Oxford through the eccentric conduct of a knight of the plough named Hedges, known under the sobriquet of "Lord Chief Justice Burns." It appears that His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, in company with Colonel Keppel, Equerry in Waiting, Mr. Herbert Fisher, private tutor to His Royal Highness, Earl Brownlow, Sir Frodrick Johnstone, Mr. H. Le Merchant, M. H. Taylor, went out with the south Oxfordshire hounds on Friday last; but, meeting with indifferent sport, the Royal party, on their return to Oxford, determined on a ride across the country. Not being acquainted with the locality they made their way across the lands of farmer Hedges at Barton, and, without being aware of the temper of the sturdy farmer, rode into farm yard. Farmer Hedges, with his usual regard for trespassers, immediately closed the gates on the illustrious party, and levied a fine of a sovereign for damages, enforcing the demand with an intimation that none of them should leave until he had pocketed the amount. The party first imagined that when Hedges was acquainted with the names of his visitors he would at once have claimed the Royal clemency; but in this they were quite mistaken, for upon being informed that he was detaining the future King of England, he remarked, "Prince or no Prince, I'll have my money." The astonishment of the Prince's retinue may well be imagined, but being mounted and encompassed by stone walls they were compelled to yield to the inexorable farmer, who, added to an "amiable" disposition, is possessed of a powerful frame, and on the occasion in question was armed with a dung fork, the emblem of his calling. The Royal party, although somewhat annoyed at their detention and obstinacy of the farmer, made the best of the joke, the Prince above the rest being much amused at the turn matters had taken.

AYRSHIRE CATTLE.

This breed are so remarkable for yielding an abundant supply of milk, and are so well suited for the dairy, that they are worthy of notice. We have seen them in their native pastures on the banks of the Clyde, in Scotland, and, in different parts of Europe and America, and in every place we have found them sustaining their high character as milkers.

The origin of this breed has not been clearly ascertained, but it is very probable that they have sprung from the native stock of the country, and that their excellence has been obtained by selecting and crossing the breeding animals.

The Ayrshire cow is not large, but her shape and figure denote that she is made for milk. It is a well known fact that cows which have a tendency to become fat, are seldom remarkable for yielding much milk, and are very apt to go dry early in the season. The Ayrshires are good milkers, but they do not fatten readily, and on this account are objected to by breeders. The Devons and the Durhams have a much greater tendency to fatten than the Ayrshires. The colour of this breed is generally a yellowish red, mottled and spotted by white; the cows are remarkably quiet and docile, and when a large herd of them are feeding together in the rich, green pastures of their native country, their appearance affords as pretty a rural sight as can be imagined.

The Ayrshire belong to the middle horned; they have for a considerable time been considered as the best milkers of all breeds, but latterly they have been generally superseded by the Durhams on account of the latter combining several desirable qualities. The beef of the Ayrshires, although of good quality, and possessing a good intermixture of fat and lean, makes a poor return to the butcher, and is not in much request. It is said that an Ayrshire cow of small size will consume as much food as a much larger animal of the Devon and Durham breed.

Mr. Aiton, in his "Treatise on the Dairy Breed of Cows," thus describes the Ayrshires:—"The shapes most approved of are as follows: The head small; but rather long and narrow at the muzzle, the eye small, but smart and lively; the horns small clear and crooked, and their roots a considerable distance from each other; neck long and slender, tapering towards the head with no loose skin below; hind quarters large, hook straight, broad behind joints, rather loose and open; scrotum deep, pelvis capacious and wide over the hips, with round fleshy buttocks; tail long and small; legs small and short, with firm joints; udder capacious, broad and square, stretching forward and neither fleshy, low lying or loose; the milk veins large and prominent; teats short, all pointing outward, and at considerable distance from each other. The head, vision, horns and all parts of least value small, and the general figure compact and well proportioned."

The cattle from which the Ayrshires sprung are said to have been bred on Lord Marshmont's estates in Berwickshire, and at Lornberg in Cyle. They soon attracted the notice of breeders, and their progeny were early sought after. It was not until 1780 that the improved breed was generally cultivated and established in Ayrshire.

The quantity of milk yielded by an Ayrshire cow is very large for her size. Five gallons daily for two or three months after calving may be considered a fair average; she may be expected to yield three gallons daily for the next three months, and one gallon and a half during the succeeding four months.

The quality of milk is best known by the quantity of butter or cheese that it will produce. Three and a half gallons of the milk of an Ayrshire will generally produce one pound and a half of butter, and twenty gallons, with the cream will yield twenty-four pounds of sweet milk cheese.

The advocates of the Ayrshires says that they will fatten as well as cattle of any other breed, and on this account strenuously recommend them to notice, but a little experience will show the fallacy of this representation, and prove that while they excel for the dairy, they are not very profitable for the grazing or butcher. A cross between the Durham and Ayrshire produces excellent stock.

CULTURE OF ASPARAGUS.

In order to grow this vegetable well the soil should be deepened to a considerable extent and well prepared. It should be trenched in the fall and thrown up in rough ridges to be be ameliorated by the frost of winter. Forking the ground at every opportunity and turning up fresh surfaces to the influence of the atmosphere, will have a tendency to prepare it for the reception of the seed or the plants in spring. The beds should be four feet wide, well manured with the richest compost to which a considerable portion of salt should be added. Two rows of plants are sufficient in each bed, and the alleys between the beds should be two or two and a half feet wide. Many persons plant cauliflowers or broccoli in these alleys, but this practice has been dissentitioned in the best gardens. The plants should be set out in drills two feet apart, and twelve inches from each other in the drills. Some persons prefer to sow the seed spaced as above, and contend that they can rise stronger plants in this way. Some market gardeners pile on a heavy coat of soil from the alleys early in spring, and the plants growing up through this, form the slender white stems which are sold in the market; but in the best private gardens the beds are protected by a covering of rich manure during the winter and early spring months; this is forked up and broken before the plant vegetate in spring, some fresh soil added and the bed raised by a stronger border above the beds. Whilst treated in this way the plants throw up strong and vigorous stems, which are cut when fifteen inches high, and are not allowed to run to seed.

J. W. BECKER, Proprietor.
IS pleasantly situated at the head of ST. PAUL STREET, amongst the largest wholesale houses in the city. It has (with fashionable exception), and immediately with the first Merchants of both Provinces) become so great a favorite, that it is now acknowledged to be THE Business House of Montreal. To meet the extensive increase during the last year in the business of the house, the proprietor has built a large addition. The Dining Room has been extended and made more commodious; there have been completed in the new wing, a great number of well-ventilated sleeping rooms, and the House throughout has been refitted, and new and certain many improvements and conveniences hitherto unknown to its guests. The beds of the whole house, are a great exposure, being furnished with NEW SPRING MATTRASSES. The Proprietor expects that by continuing his personal management of the ALBION, he may merit a continuance of the full confidence of the travelling community, as to name in the large Hotels, and a liberal share of patronage.

THE SIGN AND THE GRIP.

I once used to think
There was nothing like Drink,
As my brandy and wine I would sip,
Till I learned the Lesson
Where they ought not a mend
They learnt me the Sign and the Grip.

I thought patriotism I knew
Read the Statute by candle,
On its knowing captions of speed "Fire"

I was wrong and they right
They learnt me the Sign and the Grip.

My breath doesn't like gas,
My hat don't me stay,
My coat had a shocking bad rip;
I'd but one head and one shoe,
The eye black and blue,
When they learnt me the Sign and the Grip.

My credit was gone,
I had nothing to pawn,
The sole walk my feet used to trip,
My children were all poor,
And I had no fire,
Made they learnt me the Sign and the Grip.

My poor wife would sigh,
My children, would cry,
They'd no bread, nor all potatoes a chip;
They were hungry and cold, nor
She'd do nothing but scold,
Till they learnt me the Sign and the Grip.

But now I'm a man,
I'll stay at home,
On board of the Temperance ship;
My clothes are all new,
And my hat—[illegible]
Since they learnt me the Sign and the Grip.

My wife does not sigh,
Her children cry,
Nor there's jog before eye,

Tag-Rag.

WHAT HE WAS, AND WHAT HE IS.

BY REV. WM. REID, EDMONTON.

"Tag-Rag! the alike seemed strange, and expressive of something out of the ordinary course. We were seated at tea when it fell for the first time upon our ears. Tag-Rag! Who is that? The conversation now took a new direction.

The journeymen sat on one side of the table, and the apprentices on the other, imitating the drinking practices of those above them, and thus the boys had learned the art of drinking before they had learned their trade.

In course of time Tag became a tradesman, working two days in a week, and drinking four. Next he wrought as a "journeyman," all this answered him; he thought, very well, as his thirst for liquor was lessened by a daily allowance of three and four glasses of whiskey or rum. Next he became a porter at the Greenock quay, and continued to this so long as his rage and misery would permit.

AUSTRIA.

Vienna, 31st March.—The Austrian Cabinet has resolved to protest solemnly against the annexation of Tuscany, Parma and Modena to Piedmont. A note to this effect dated 26th, has been already addressed to the Cabinet of Turin, in which Austria establishes her immutable right to oppose an act which, in despoiling legitimate Princes, would also destroy the succession to the house of Hapsburg. A copy is to be forwarded to all the foreign Cabinets, to signify that a Chamber State is addressed, in the effect that Austria, in confining herself at the present time to protesting against the fait accompli, hopes that Europe will appreciate on this occasion a most overruling proof of her moderation and of her desire to maintain the peace of the world.

Vienna, April 1.—In reply to the protest of Switzerland against the annexation of Savoy, Austria says she can still abandon her complete confidence in the wisdom and loyalty of the Federal Council. She nevertheless declares that Switzerland will assume the great responsibility of bringing about a war between France and Austria.

SARDINIA.

Parliament was opened on the 2nd. The King was received with indescribable enthusiasm. His address to Parliament, referring thanks to France for her services for the welfare of Italy, announcing the cession of Savoy and Nizza, and the annexation of Tuscany and Parma, and proclaiming that the welfare of the people and the guarantee of its security, which is no longer the fruit of the treaties now of the middle ages. BY THE AUSTRALASIAN.

HEENAN BOUND TO KEEP THE PEACE.

Portland, April 23.

The steamer Australasian, from Liverpool at noon on the 11th via Queenstown on the 12th, arrived at this port at 6 o'clock this morning.

GREAT BRITAIN.

There was no news of political importance.

The French and other continental journals accuse the English Parliament of favoring the recent contest in Spain, and the insurrection in Sicily.

A reform meeting was held in Hyde Park on Sunday the 8th. The proceedings were tame.

The submarine cable for Gibraltar will be ready by the middle of September.

Heenan was brought before the magistrate at Derby on the 7th, charged with the intention of being engaged in a prize-fight, and thereby causing a breach of the peace.

Mr. Leech appeared in his behalf, and said that Heenan had never broken the peace in England and had no intention of doing so. True, he may have made use of harsh language in the excitement of his capture, when his passions were aroused, but when he considered he had been hunted out of eight counties, while his opponent, Sayers was allowed to go with the greatest of impunity, he did feel sore at the punishment he was receiving. He apologized if he had used expressions which he ought not. Two respectable gentlemen were ready to give bail, to the amount required, guided by the station in life of the parties in America. Heenan was a blacksmith. He hoped the Bench would assess the bail at a small amount.

The Clerk announced that the Bench agreed to take Heenan's own recognizance for £200, with two sureties in £100 each.—(Loud applause.) He added that the authorities had no ill-feeling against him beyond the preservation of the peace.

It was stated by the Court that Heenan could not further be interfered with unless he broke the peace. The sureties were promptly signed and Heenan and his friends left Derby for London.

Bell's Life was most indignant at the capture, which it attributed to Heenan and his company going to a place where they were almost certain of arrest. A correspondent criticises Heenan, and says he took all necessary precautions, employing a man to sound the police and put them off the track. This person deceived Heenan and his friends and gave information that led to his arrest. Bell's Life indignantly mouths the idea that Sayers or his friends caused the arrest, and states that the Heenan party believed Sayers utterly incapable of such conduct.

It was considered certain that the fight would come off on the day fixed, the 16th.

The Government had reprimanded the Pays and Patrie for giving currency to rumours that England was blameable for the outbreaks in Spain and Italy.

The flour market was heavy and lower. Wheat quiet and unchanged. The Quotations on the Bourse were light.

ITALY.

The King of Sardinia was about to make a tour of inspection through his dominions. The British Ambassador, by orders from London, and the Sardinian Court would accompany him. The Parliament of Turin would adjourn to enable the members to join the royal cortege.

HUNGARY.

There has been a great anti-Austrian demonstration of the country, the occasion being the display of a standard the deaf from Agoston received from the police in the recent demonstrations. 6,000 persons followed the cortege to the provincial capital to-gether. The police did not interfere, and there was no disorder.

SPAIN.

The Emperor of Morocco had omitted papers of import. Gen. Ortega, and three persons of the Madrid revolutionary movement at Gibraltar. A small body of Insurgents had been defeated at Bilbao, province de Ortega's note.

A Concordat had been concluded between Spain and Russia and was promulgated.

REVOLUTIONARY ATTEMPT ON THE SWISS FRONTIER.

To the Editor of the London Times.

SIR,—In the events which occurred in this city yesterday any penalty to abuse-publication in other quarters, and pride to succour a cause, the which, in the present critical state of the relations of Switzerland with France, could not be highly propitiated to the interests of the former country, I trust you will permit me, as an eye-witness, to give an account of what actually did take place. It would, indeed, be most unjust to the community of Geneva if the impression were allowed to prevail that the 20th and unjustifiable act of a few misled and misguided persons had been countenanced or encouraged by any section of the population whatever.

It came that at four o'clock yesterday evening some fifty or sixty persons, about half of whom were armed, entered in crossing the confluence of the Isère stream, and followed the captain, whose complicity in the affair has yet to be determined, to convey them to Thonon, the chief town of Chablais, with the avowed intention of exciting the population of that province to a demonstration in favor of the Swiss occupation. Before midday the news of this escapade had spread all over the town, and the greatest excitement prevailed. The streets were crowded with excited groups, discussing in most violent terms an attempt so futile and, at the same time, evidently prepared to their cause that it was broadly asserted those who had taken part in it were the paid agents of a neighboring country. Even the authorities found themselves compromised by the negligence of the police, in allowing the steamer to stay away.

Meantime prompt measures were taken for the arrest of the culprits. These were facilitated by the opportune arrival of Col. Ziegler, who has just been appointed by the Federal Government to the command of the Geneva troops. Two companies of Chasseurs were embarked on board a steamer, and proceeded in quest of M. Perrier, the organizer of the expedition, and his comrades. The excitement had by the time reached so great a pitch that it was deemed advisable to call a public meeting, and at 5 o'clock in the afternoon about 5,000 persons assembled in the Electoral Buildings to hear the explanations of the notes-rien.

Throughout the whole of the proceedings the vast assembly showed animated by the single desire of manifesting, in the most decided and unequivocal manner their disapprobation of the act of M. Perrier and his full wers, and they had an opportunity of showing this more forcibly a few moments after the meeting dispersed, when the steamer containing the prisoners who had been captured on their returned voyage arrived. I saw these men as they were marched from the Hotel de Ville, and with the exception of M. Perrier himself, who wore a coat and hat, a more disreputable collection of gamins could not be picked out of the streets of Geneva.

Meantime it is not to be regretted that the people and Government of Geneva should have had this opportunity of proving to the world their respect for international rights which still exist, and their determination to remain steadily faithful to the Federal authority, and to those principles of loyalty which have ever characterized the policy of Switzerland.

Yours obedient,
LAURENCE OLIPHANT.

Geneva, March 31.

P. S.—The trial of Perrier and his comrades is now taking place, and I am informed that Perrier has recently returned from Paris, where he has been resident for some time. It is worthy of note that the gang who accompanied him are men of so low a class that they are disavowed by every section of politicians here.

ANTI-PAPAL DEMONSTRATION IN ROME.

The Rome correspondence of the Morning Post, writing on the 20th inst., says:—Yesterday being St. Joseph's Day, it was generally thought that a grand pro-mende demonstration would be made outside the Porta Pia, in honor of Joseph Garibaldi, and in commemoration of the annexation of Central to Upper Italy.—The government, consequently gave orders for that long road to be strongly de-tached by detachments of horse and foot gendarmerie, and General de Goyon contributed some companies of French infantry. These dispositions had the effect of checking the demonstration, and until thousands of promenaders resorted to the Corso instead, where great numbers of them appeared with bunches of violets in their button holes. The gendarmes, who had orders to intimidate the Corso, took umbrage at this symbol, and insisted upon the promenaders pulling them, instances of which each other's arms. So strange a demand brought on in some cases unpleasant collisions, and the gendarmes proceeded to make some arrests upon the Piazza Colonna, which was resisted by the people. The gendarmes drew their swords, and a conflict would have taken place then and there had not a French officer interfered, and, reasoning with the gendarmes, induced them to give up the prisoners. The people took this as a triumph, and the gendarmes sheathed off amidst universal hissing. They lost no time in making their complaint at head-quarters, and a quarter of an hour afterwards a patrol of horse gendarmerie issued forth from the police-office in the Monte Citorio Palace on the other side. These two forces, then, with drawn swords, made a combined attack upon the unarmed people on the Piazza Colonna, and in the Corso, striking right and left, turning back carriages, knocking down foot passengers, men, women and children, ordering the canfe to be closed and house doors shut, and in fact running a complete amok. The people seemed terror stricken, and those who were not quick enough in escaping from the Corso by the side streets were prostrated by the numerous sabres of the gendarmes. The numbers of these victims are differently estimated—some accounts giving eighteen and others sixty. There are only six at the hospital of San Giacomo, and four at the Consolazione; but probably the greater part of the wounded persons would prefer being tended in their own houses. A considerable proportion of the sufferers are foreigners attracted by the beauty of the day, and the hour of the promenade in Corso. One or two Americans and some Germans have felt the weight of the gendarmes' blows; and a large number of Frenchmen, several of whom were officers in plain clothes, are amongst the wounded. Of these I can mention the names of Colonel Pennell and Captain Michael, and I hear heard a report of General de Goyon's prudence being wounded also. The General, however, is cognizant of his officers being about on duty-parade, and threatens to punish them for breach of discipline as soon as they recover from their present slight evils! Old representatives, Mr. Odo Russell, was promenading down the Corso at the time of the fray in question with a friend who replies in that street but his carriage was turned into a side lane by the gendarmes, and no argument could induce the police coachman to return into the tabooed Corso; so Mr. Russell was obliged to regain thither on foot.

The leaders of the moderate Liberal party belonging to the most respectable middle class of society, Roman Indigenous and proprietors, Signori Sterbini, Montanelli, Tittoni, Ferri, and Gallenga (the same who has subsequently been released from prison), were summoned yesterday morning before the director of police, and ordered to leave Pontificate dominions within 24 hours, as they were exiled from Rome. They accordingly went from Civita Vecchia this evening, by steamer, to Leghorn.

The Bishops are the objects of much the place offering of good Catholics, packed in large as the Vatican; so that, in case of a disturbance, the Bishops cannot escape, and are compelled to remain in SUMMER HAS COME.

The time of the singing of birds is come,
And winter is just and gone;
Duck ebouls are melting from Heaven's dome,
And lucks spring up from their leather home,
To sing to the rising sun.

Come with the sound of thy musical wing,
Thou thrill and gentle dove,
With thy modest garb and snowy ring,
Come mingle thy notes with the garb of spring
In a low sweet song of love.

The winter is o'er, the rain is stayed,
And flowers on the earth appear;
From each little grave where the germ was laid,
Springs forth in new beauty a fresh green blade
To bloom through another year.

Son of my soul! shall I fear to lay
This dust where the spring flowers be?
No, thou wilt remember my sleeping clay
(For I witness Thy truth in the flowers of May,)
And raise me, no more to die.

The time of the singing of birds will come,
And the summer sun shine bright;
But a beam more glorious shall pierce my tomb
And this dust shall live in unfading bloom,
'Neath the beams of eternal light!

A Night in New Orleans.

Printers tell many queer, quaint, quizzical, and sometimes startling stories; and while they do a great deal in that way for the fun of the thing, it is not to be supposed that they are always joking—always jilting it, merely for the sake of raising a laugh, or creating wonder. In their numerous flittings they mingle with many strange sights, and often encounter perils which to many would appear incredible.

We will relate a little story which we heard from the lips of a poor fellow now dead and gone.

In the year 1854 we were assisting in the editorial department of a daily paper which was published in one of the small cities of New York. One night—or rather morning. (for editors, reporters and printers are compelled to keep all sorts of hours)—after the "forms" were "locked up," and everything was ready for a final adjournment to our respective boarding houses, a proposition was made to visit a restaurant near by, for the double purpose of having a smoke and refreshing the inner man with a little something good and pleasant to the palate. Accordingly we prepared to enter the saloon, and while discussing the good things before us, entertained each other by relating our adventures by sea and land.

"Did I ever tell you of that adventure I had in New Orleans?" said Charley Redmond, a gay, dashing, young man.

"Give us not," was the general response.

"Well, will you hear it now?"

"Certainly!" fell from half a dozen lips.

"Well then; I was working on a morning paper in New Orleans, during the winter of 1850, and as I was going from the office to my boarding house, at one twelve o'clock one night, I was suddenly startled by the abrupt and unexpected appearance of a female, who rushed before me and threw herself down in my path. I was just in the light of a street lamp at the time, and as the woman turned her face up to mine, I noticed that she was both young and beautiful.

"Save me, save me!" she cried, clasping my leg frantically.

"Save you from what?" I demanded, as I raised her to her feet; "I do not see anything."

"O, sir, a brutal looking man pursuing me, threatening my life and honor!" was the, trembling agitated reply. My mother was taken sick and I was forced to go out for medicines, and that is the way I came in the street at so late an hour. It couldn't be helped, sir, though I never was out so late without company."

"Where do you live?" I inquired, fascinated by the girl's beautiful face and soft voice.

"Not far from here, sir—only around the next street," said the girl; "but I am so afraid! I shall meet that man again. O, sir! if you will only see me safely home, I shall be deeply indebted to you."

"Certainly I will," was the response,—"but still there don't appear to be anybody in pursuit of you now."

At that moment I heard a clatter of feet down the street, and turning my face in that direction, I saw a man approaching the spot where we were standing; at a rapid run.

The girl looked in the same direction at the same time I did.

"There he comes now," she exclaimed in a deep fearful whisper, at the same time tightly clutching me by the arm.

Suddenly turning away from me the girl darted up the street.

"Stop, young lady!" I cried, "I will protect you—you need not fear!"

That was rather a loud promise, under the circumstances, but I didn't stop to consider what I said.

The girl didn't heed me, but dashed on, and involuntarily I followed in her steps.—After running a couple of blocks she stopped and looked back at me. In a few moments I reached her side, and by that time the man was not far behind me.

"You had better come into the house, sir!" she said nervously; "for I am sure that man is very evil designing, and may do you some harm."

As she spoke she mounted the steps of a very ancient looking dwelling, and violently rang the bell, I followed her, not exactly from prudential motives, but because I wanted to see more of her and because I was fond of adventure of any kind.

Almost instantly the door was opened, when I followed the young girl inside. An old Hibernian looking negro woman stood in the hall just beyond the door holding a lamp in her hand.

"Why, what's the matter, Carline," demanded the hag.

"Shut the door, quick! I've been waylaid by a ruffian!" responded the girl excitedly. "The very old," the old woman muttered, as she locked the door and shot the bolt. "Come this way, missy, and tell me all about it."

Ushered into a small room on the right of the hall, I related the circumstances as they occurred, and the old negress listened attentively.

"Keep me safe a minute, sir, while I speak to my mother!" pursued the young girl. The next moment, and before I had time to reply, the door closed and I was left alone.

I walked to a sofa—a light was burning in the room—and sat down. Then I took a survey of the apartment. The furniture had been good in its day, but was then much worn and battered.

Two minutes afterwards the satanic negress opened the parlor door, and poked her hideous face into the room.

"Miss Carline 'quests the gentleman to walk up stairs," said she.

I began to think the proceedings rather strange, but still my reckless spirit induced me to follow the negress.

Up two flights of stairs and to the door of a back apartment she led me. She knocked and the door was opened.

"Walk in, sar, if you please!" she said very indifferently.

I stepped into an apartment that had no windows in it, and was confronted by a huge burly negro man. At the same moment I heard the door closed and locked, and for the first time began to think seriously of danger.

"Fork ober, sar!" exclaimed the negro abruptly and threateningly.

I carried quite a valuable watch and had considerable amount of money about me, for that night I had been paid off at the office and a really clever sum was standing to my account. I knew I had been drawn into a den of thieves, but I resolved not to lose my property without making an effort to save it, let the consequences be what they might.

"Do you mean to rob me?" I demanded resolutely.

"'Spect I do?" was the unmistakeable reply.

"I warn you!" said I, my blood boiling up, "that I shall not patiently submit to any such outrage."

"Don' 'spect you will, sar," responded the negro, as he displayed a murderous looking knife; "but we nebber do anything by halves. We nebber lets any one that comes here go away again—cause they might tell tales."

"Would you murder me, you black thief!" I cried, passionately.

"'Spect I would," rejoined the cut-throat with a broad grin. "I'se used to dat sort ob business and don't mind it a bit."

I was now fully alive to the fact that I was in a very dangerous situation, and, to tell the real truth, I felt dreadful nervous over it. What to do I knew not. That the girl I had encountered was probably a Quadroon, and certainly a decoy—and that I had been lead to the house to be plundered and perhaps murdered, I had every reason to believe.

"Come, sar, fork ober, an' den jump down dar."

The rascal must have touched a spring somewhere, for, as he spoke, a trap door flew open in the centre of the floor.

I looked at the trap, and then at the negro, in doubt as to whether I heard all aright.

"If yer jump down, sar, yer'll sabe me trouble of frowin' yer down!" he added fiendishly.

"You bloody rascal!" I cried, madly, "do you think I'll deprive myself of life to gratify you?"

"You won't do nuffin, hey?" cried the negro, scowling at me like a wild beast, "den take dat!"

The villain made a slashing cut at me, but with a single bound I sprang clear to the other side of the trap and escaped the deadly blow.

Boiling over with diabolical rage, the accursed cut-throat again sprang at me, bounding across the pit with the spring of madness. As his feet touched the edge upon which I was standing, I involuntarily put out my hand towards him, and shoved him back. I hardly intended to throw him down the pit, but down he went, in a moment disappearing out of sight.

I did not stop to learn the villain's fate, for I judged that I should have more such work on my hands before I got out of the house, if indeed I succeeded in making my escape from the den of infamy.

Instantly after the fall of the negro, I ran around the pit, and sprang towards the door. Just as I reached the door, however, and was about taking hold of the knob, some one turned it outside. I sprang up against the wall and in a way that would keep me out of sight of any one that might enter.—The next moment the door opened, and a head was thrust into the room. Without waiting to see who it was, and taking it for granted, that all in the house were arrayed against me, I doubled my fists, and with all strength dealt a blow at the head that brought the person at full length on the floor. The same moment showed me that it was the negress.

The hag was entirely insensible and I forthwith dragged her into the room, and shut the door. At length my attentive ear caught the sound of light footsteps outside, and a moment afterward the door was again opened. This time it was my beautiful deceiver who appeared. The first thing her eyes seemed to encounter was the prostrate form of the old negress, and with an exclamation of astonishment she darted into the room.

Quick as lightning I placed my back against the door. The movement at once attracted the girl's attention to me.

"Now, my lady!" I hissed out—for I was intensely excited—you and I must have an understanding. You follow into this farce, I don't by your tricks, and you have got to show me the easy out of it, or by all my hopes, yonder, black pit shall be your grave. Anyway I may have my life, and I am as desperate as man can be. You see that old hag can't help you just now," I added, pointing to the negress; "and the villain who was here and would have taken my life, lies at the bottom of that pit."

The girl looked bewildered and confounded.

"I could not help it, sir. Indeed, I am driven to desperation."

"That matters not to me," I added decidedly; "can you get out of the house?"

"Yes, sir, I can," was the eager reply.

"Will you do it?" I demanded.

"I will, sir," she responded earnestly.

"Then lead on," I ordered, pushing to the door.

"But work you—if I see a sign of treachery or notice the least effort to create alarm, I will tear you from limb to limb."

I was strong and wild, and meant what I said, and the girl saw it.

"There is no one else in the house, sir, I assure you," she responded.

"Lead the way," I said, hardly crediting her words.

The girl passed from the room when I locked the door, put the key in my pocket and followed close behind her. No lights were visible anywhere except in the room we had just left; but keeping the girl in sight, and within reach of my hand, I stepped along. In a few moments we reached the front door. The girl stopped a moment, and, I judge, got a key, in an instant, however, she opened the door, and I sprang out-side, thanking God for my preservation.

Without a word, even without a look behind me, I started away, hardly conscious of the direction I pursued. I found my way to my boarding house, however, and at the earliest practical time, laid the whole matter before the authorities. Finally I led a party of police to the house. Not being able to obtain admittance in the usual manner, the doors were forced. Everything in the house remained undisturbed, but not a soul was to be found high or low. The trap, however, was soon discovered, and we found on examination, that there was a succession of traps which led to a deep murky pit in the cellar. The house had evidently been a haunt of robbers for a long time.

At the bottom of the pit we found the mangled remains of the negro, and a heap of fleshless bones. I shuddered to think what might have been my fate, and congratulated myself on my fortunate escape. I had evidently been more favored than others. That is all gentlemen.

"A very good story, very well told," said I, as Redmond concluded.

"And true, gentlemen, whether you believe it or not."

MY GRANDFATHER'S STORY.

"My story is very brief," said the old gentleman. "I am about to relate a sad fatal occurrence, the remembrance of which is indelibly stamped upon my mind, never to be obliterated while life remains. Years ago it happened.

The old man paused, swept from his brow the truant, venerable locks and seating himself in his arm chair, proceeded as follows.

"What I account you may oblige to nothing unusual or strange, but for myself as far from believing that the circumstance was brought to pass by chance, I can trace in it the anger of the Almighty God, and have ever thought it to be the just and speedy vengeance of Heaven upon those who erred willingly, and who, in the face of warning and kindly admonition, still persisted in flagrant and unscrupulous disobedience of God's command to Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy.

"A great portion of the year 1830 was spent by men in traveling over the southern and western part of the union. One Sabbath day if I recollect aright, it was during the month of July—found me agreeably and hospitably entertained at a farm house not far from where stands the city of C——. The inhabitants of this farm house consisted of the "old folks," their two daughters, and three hired farm-laborers.

"I beguiled away the morning of the day very pleasantly chatting with mine host, whom I discovered to be a person of considerable intelligence, and in possession of a variety of information more than is usually found with one in his station in life. He was likewise very religiously inclined and well read in the Scriptures, of which he appeared to be a complete commentary.

"There was one object upon which he expatiated at large during our morning's conversation; the subject was on the evils of gambling. I have often thought how strange and ominous it was that we should discuss this subject on the very day ——, but stay I will not go in advance of my story.

"The good farmer told me, while the tears stole down his aged cheeks, of an only son who was ruined and who met his death at the gaming table. He made known to me the fact that the men then in his employ were addicted to wielding the "devil's tools," as he termed the implements of gaming. He had detected them in the act and had seriously reproved them, and pointed out its manifold evils. The men promised faithfully to renounce what they still practiced in secret.

Towards the wane of the afternoon the dull heavy clouds threatened a heavy storm and I drew my chair to the window to watch the approach and view its effect upon the beautiful landscape spread out before me. I have often observed that the approach of a storm occasions a certain indescribable feeling to arise on the frame of a sensitive person; never shall I forget my own sensations at the time. There appeared to be a vague foreshadowing of some terrible scene constantly before my mental vision.

"Patter, patter, descended the rain in huge drops, rattling from the house top and rebounding in minute cataracts from the pavement. The lightning was intensely vivid, and the reverberating roar of the thunder deafening. I never witnessed a tempest to equal it in terrific grandeur and sublimity.

"The wearing of the elements soon subsided and the sun shone forth in all its magnificence, hanging a glittering diamond upon every leaf and tiny blade of grass. As soon as the ground was in a proper condition for walking, I sauntered abroad to endeavor if possible to rid myself of the foreboding which still clung to me. In my fear of the premises, I neglected prior to the burn the fire of which I was anxiously apprehensive, and part of winter. I can but very mechanically describe the scene that met my view.

"Seated upon the floor were four young men apparently deeply absorbed in a game of cards, while a fifth stood erect against the wall gazing intently upon the players, his right hand grasped the pitchfork.

"I entered the building not a man stirred, each seemed thoroughly wrapped up in his game. A few pieces of silver, the stake, lay before them. I accosted the group familiarly; not a muscle moved, not a sound broke upon my ear save the echo of my own tones among the rafters. Approaching I placed my hand on the shoulder of the man nearest to me, at the same time stooping to bring my body on a level with the silent motionless forms before me. I now perceived the set stare of every glazed eye. Each livid distorted countenance! each clenched hand! to my unspeakable horror I saw that Death had set his seal upon every man! I rushed out from the place overwhelmed with terror and made the best of my way to the farm house.

"It was some time before I was sufficiently recovered from my fright to render myself understood by those who sought the cause of my alarm. Summoning as many as could be got together, we proceeded in a body to the spot. There sat the ghastly group. There stood the pale spectre still grasping the fork. Upon every countenance was imprinted the emotion an instant before death.

The exulting smile of the successful player and the angry troubled brow of the unsuccessful player, were portrayed with an awful fidelity. A strong taste in odor pervaded the air of the apartment; it had been struck by lightning during the storm, and the subtle fluid had scattered death among the Sabbath-breaking gaming party within its walls."

YOU WILL BE WANTED.

Take courage young man. What if you are but an humble and obscure apprentice—a poor neglected orphan—a scoff and by-word of the thoughtless and gay, who despise virtue in rags, because of its tatters. You have an intelligent mind, all untutored though it may be! Have you a virtuous aim, a pure desire and an honest heart? Depend upon it, one of these days you will be wanted. The time may be long deferred. You may grow to manhood, and may even reach your prime ere this call is made; but virtuous aims, pure desires and honest hearts are too few not to be wanted. Your virtues shall not always wrap about you as with a mantle; obscurity shall not always veil you from the multitude. Be christian in your conduct with circumstances. Be active, however small be your sphere of action.—it will surely enlarge with every moment and your influence will have constant increase.

FUN AT HOME.

Don't be afraid of a little fun at home, good people! Don't shut up your houses lest the sun should fade your carpets and your hearts, lest a hearty laugh should shake down some of the musty old cobwebs there! If you want to ruin your sons let them think that all mirth and social enjoyment must be left on the threshold without, when they come home at night. When once a house is regarded only as a place to eat, drink and sleep in, the work is begun that ends in gambling houses and reckless degradation.

Young people must have fun and relaxation somewhere; if they do not find it at their hearth-stones, it will be sought in other and perhaps less profitable places. Therefore, let the fire burn brightly at night, and make the home-nest delightful with all those little hearts that parents so perfectly understand. Don't repress the buoyant spirits of your children; half an hour of merriment round the lamp and fire-light of home blots out the remembrance of many a care and annoyance during the day, and the best safeguard they can take with them into the world is the unseen influence of a bright little domestic sanctum.

Increase of Property in Great Britain.

Recent returns presented to Parliament show in a very striking manner the increase of property and income in Great Britain during the last fourteen or fifteen years.—The return includes every description of property which is subject to the Property and Income Tax. It commences with the next assessment of property to the Income Tax under schedule A, of the profits of farmers under schedule B, and of trade under schedule D. Under schedule A, property in land, in warehouses, in mills and public works, is exhibited. In 1842-3 the value of this description amounted to seventy-six millions and a half; in 1853-4 it had increased to ninety-one millions and a quarter; and in 1857-8 to nearly one hundred and two millions. The increase in the first ten years was nineteen per cent; in the four subsequent years eleven per cent. According to the schedule B, the profits on farming were, in 1842-3, ten millions and a-half; in 1853-4, twelve millions and a half; in 1857-8, to thirteen millions and a half. The increase in the first ten years was seventeen per cent; in the subsequent four years, eight per cent. The profits on trade, commerce, and shopping were, in 1842-3, fifty-two millions three quarters; in 1853-4 sixty-eight millions; in 1857-8 seventy-three millions. The ratio of increase in the first ten years was twenty-one per cent; in the four following years, seven per cent. In Scotland according to these statistics, the general prosperity has been even greater. Under schedule A, the increase in the ten years was twenty-one per cent; in the four years twelve per cent. The farming schedule shows an increase in the ten years of seventeen per cent. Under the D schedule the increase in the ten years was forty per cent; in the four years, three per cent.

TRIAL OF A FRENCH BISHOP.

The unusual spectacle of a bishop tried, for libel drew crowds to the Palais de Justice on Wednesday, March 14, to witness the proceedings in the double action brought against M. Dupanloup, Bishop of Orleans, by the editors of the Siecle, and by the heirs and descendants of M. Rothomain, who has Bishop of Orleans under the First Empire.

The Bishop came into court, attended by his two Vicars General. The usual questions as to where and when he was born, &c., was put to him, and these preliminaries having been disposed of,—

M. Senard rose and opened the case for the Siecle in a speech which lasted four hours, and the dullness of which was overpowering. After reminding the court that the Siecle was a liberal paper, that it numbered among its founders M. Odillon Barrot, and after reading long extracts from articles published several years ago by the Siecle, in which the right reverend defendant was eulogized for rendering the illiberal Ultramontanism of M. Veuillot, he came at last to the libel complained of. The Bishop had taken a prominent part in the discussion to which the celebrated pamphlet, Le Pape et le Congres, had given rise, and in the course of that controversy had written a letter to the Constitutionnel, in which, while paying the editor of that paper, M. Granguillot, the compliment, of stating that he was a man of honor, he left it to be inferred that the editors of the Siecle were not.—Upon this M. Senard rang the changes, as barristers will do, and at length sat down, evidently much fatigued, but not so much as his hearers.

M. Berryer then rose and commenced the Bishop's defence. He said this action should never have been brought. It was a mere case of fin gusque. In controversies, where both parties got much excited, personalities were sometimes used, and in this case the Bishop had only retaliated upon the editors of the Siecle. These thin-skinned gentlemen evidently laboured under the delusion that while they were free to insult their opponents, distort their language, misrepresent their views, they were themselves unassailable. What had the Siecle done? Why, they had applied to the right reverend prelate the nick-name of Basile, the creeping, slimy creature which Beaumarchais had created, and which was synonymous, in France, with a canting hypocrite. Really these gentlemen forget that those who live in glass houses should not throw stones. For his part he could not understand journalists bringing such an action.—What was the use of wielding a pen if they could not use it in self-defence? The fact was that such an action was characteristic of the times they lived in. Liberty of speech and the freedom of the press had passed away. But yet he should have hardly expected to find liberal journalists so far forgetting that it had existed so to bring an action to protect themselves against being roughly handled in argument. M. Berryer then wound up in a splendid peroration in favour of liberty, which called down a burst of applause.

This gave rise to a little scene.

The President—The court has heard your speech with patience, M. Berryer. I beg you will not try it too far, and hope the audience won't forget their self-respect.

M. Berryer [with a look of great astonishment]—I am at a loss to understand the Court! I am utterly unconscious of having used one word—of having in the slightest degree given occasion to the Court to exercise a degree of patience greater than that which every advocate has a right to claim at its hands.

The President—I allude to what you said about liberty. You seem to think that liberty did not exist at present; whereas no Government has ever been so much in favor of liberty as the present Government.

Here there was laughter and the Court adjourned.

A PERP AT THE REFORMATORY.

As one of the great disciplinarian institutions of the country, the Reformatory, besides its own total attraction, should be understood as being now in full vigor and active usefulness—thoroughly organized, and as far as the limited accomodation admits, doing a good work towards regenerating the evil tendencies of the youth now incarcerated within its walls.

It is hardly necessary to state that the Reformatory, or old garrison, occupies a pleasant position on the east side of Penetanguishene Bay, at the foot of a picturesque slope, and in full command of an extensive view of the Georgian water, with its numerous islands. The drive from the village of Penetanguishene a distance of three miles, is such as one so readily calls to mind some of the more rural approaches to ancient fortresses in the old country, being thickly lined with cottages of the pensioners, some of them very tastefully decorated, and all possessing that quaint appearance that in itself indicates the residence of the "old soldier." We were conducted to the grounds by W. M. Kelly, Esq., Warden, who took the greatest pains to point out and explain what has been done and what still requires to be done for the efficiency of the institution. The reserve consists of two hundred acres, not being fenced, and a portion put in order for farming purposes. The prison itself is a substantial stone building, 111 feet long, 39 feet wide, and 24 feet high, which, with the office and grounds occupying four acres, the whole enclosed by a fence 16 feet high. On entering we were conducted to the various workshops, which already consist of carpenters, tailors, shoemakers, and coopers, all carried on, with the exception of the latter, within the main building. It is indeed a hive of industry, each of the depa. tments being presided over by a responsible man, and who, in addition to his mechanical duties, supersede that of keeper or guard. Besides the workshops is a large dining-room, school-room, two chapels, Protestant and Catholic, and sleeping-rooms. The order of proceedings is as follows:—Rise at 5½ o'clock; muster at 6—school until 7—breakfast—after which told off to their different employments until 11 55—dinner at 12—the interval until 1 being filled up by play. Again muster and off to their different shops until 5, when the roll commences in school until 5 45, followed by supper, and when are of the prints at 6 o'clock. Two guards remain with the boys, who are allowed to read and study until 7½ o'clock when all are ordered to bed.

Perhaps the most marked feature was the good order and apparent contentment of the boys, at present numbering 60, and varying in age and size from the youth to the prodigious. We were struck by the neat taken by the boys in colour and cleanliness.—The culinary department is conducted on a most economical order; the whole the best of bread and beef is given to the prisoners the average amount of feeding each has averaged only eight cents a day. Religious exercises are performed in the Chapels on the Sabbath, by the Rev. Mr. Ryan, Roman Catholic—Barrie Advocate.

You will never find a friend if you seek one without a failing.

Loyalty in the Provinces.

The talented writer of the Scottish American Journal in an able article on the relations of Britain and her Provinces, takes the ground now assumed by the best writers in Britain and America, viz: that the union existing between England and the Provinces must eventually terminate. Says the Journal,—We cannot close our eyes to the fact that there are influences at work both at home and in the Colonies which tend to loosen the tie, and threaten at no distant day altogether to part it asunder. On one side, where we should look for more enlarged and statesmanlike views, we observe a policy of entire disregard to Colonial interests. It is not only among that extreme class of individuals who think it desirable that Britain should be politically isolated from all the rest of the world, but among men of a different stamp, including even Conservatives like Lord Derby, that this policy is maintained,—a policy which must of necessity, if acted on, lead to the entire dissolution of the Colonial Empire. The sentiment of nationality is in these quarters steadily ignored, as if it were an invasion of the principles of political economy, and a sentiment, the practical development of which is incompatible with sound views regarding the objects of government. The fact of royal supremacy is all that stands in the way of this policy attaining its natural results, and the Colonies do remain a part of the Empire only because the Sovereign has certain hereditary rights, which are entrusted to the keeping of a British Minister in England and represented to an equivocal and disadvantageous way by Governors sent out to the different dependencies abroad." Not even perhaps in England, do sentiments of loyalty and nationality prevail to a greater extent than in the Provinces of Canada; on this more no fear need be entertained. But the truth is that royalty is all that exists in common in both countries, and is the only bond of union that now holds good. "Any appeal or suggestion that is made from the Colonies, or by those who are impressed with the importance of the subject, falls on dull ears, and meets with no response or attention whatever. The fact of monarchy, then, and the sentiment of royalty, alone remain to form a common basis of union.—But how slight an obstacle this in the way of those practical considerations by which communities are usually governed! Let the home administration, that is to say the Colonial Office, make but one false step of a serious nature, and the colonies affected by it are lost forever to British connection. Or, as this is not likely to happen under the present system of indifferentism, only let that system be persevered in as uniformly, and, we must add, as heartlessly, as it has been of late years, and the same result will be brought about. What has been the nature of the relations between the American Provinces and Great Britain for a considerable time past, more particularly since the British Legislature permitted the people of the Colonies to enjoy the privilege of representation by local Parliaments? We are not of the class who would desire that the mother country should be constantly protecting and encouraging, and coddling all the various interests of her numerous progeny, and think it quite right that the disposition to make such demands should be peremptorily discouraged. But is it not a fact that foreign questions, often of a purely abstract nature, enjoy far greater consideration than anything relating to the British possessions abroad? There is no petty piece of territory in Europe that does not engross a hundredfold more attention and interest than are devoted to any Colonial question whatever. Fancy a state of things to arise from the movements of Russia or Turkey which should prevent access to the Black Sea, or on the part of Spain and France for the establishment of a counterpoise to Gibraltar which should command the Straits. What a stir there would be, what a marshalling of armies and fleets, followed probably by years of bloodshed, and an accumulation of millions of debt! Yet there is an important British territory on the Continent of America to which there is no access, and from which there is no egress during nearly half the year, except through the dominions of a foreign Power, which in no well aware of the superiority it then enjoys that, at the present moment, a threat is made, out of some local jealousy and selfishness, to deprive the British community of a great portion of the benefits of international transit, so far as commercial intercourse is concerned." Appeals have been made to the Home Government for aid to construct a line of communication from the Atlantic seaboard through British territory, which might be accessible at all seasons of the year; assistance has been promised, but year after year has passed; the Provinces, having liberally arranged to perform their part of the work, have again and again in the most urgent terms pressed the British Government to fulfil its share of the obligation; members of the different Governments have on several occasions been sent to London to effect an arrangement; and at the end of twelve years of constant representation and solicitation on one side, and of fair words spoken in utter indifference on the other, the realization of the project seems more hopeless than ever, and the Provinces are left to suffer, on account of their connexions, in their commercial relations with the neighbouring Republic. And this is only one instance in a number of the ever-puzzling conduct of the British Government.

On the eve of a royal visit when the attention of the people is more particularly drawn to the subject of our relations to Britain it is the proper time to bring forward premeditatedly admitted grievances, and of these in any character pervading the minds of the Home government with a sense of our unchangeable fidelity is now when we are constantly on unusual thorns of attention in England.

[illegible] the ultimate tendency of democracy reveals itself in destruction of true liberty, and of the moral and political influence of public institutions, the superior advantages of that responsible system to the permanence of which a practical monarchy is indispensable, become every day more and more apparent. In immediate juxtaposition to the United States, the Provinces afford a fair field for the working out of this problem; but it is essential that the statesmen and people of Great Britain should give it a fair chance, for if they adopt the forcegabe conclusion, and act upon it, that the necessary items of the Colonial system is democracy, then democracy it must be, for without intimate relations with the Sovereign in a more direct manner, and one more fitted to keep alive a practical sentiment of loyalty than at present, it is impossible to carry out the system of which Britain now gives a model to the world. No king no responsible government, is an axiom which cannot be gainsaid. The friends of monarchy and of responsible government in the Provinces naturally look to Britain for intelligent and sympathizing allies and for practical support to those views which they entertain on this important question."

The New School Bill.

Just as we expected and as we stated some time ago the Superintendent of Education has something more important in his noddle than "free Schools" and compulsory attendance threat on his late tramp through the country. It was not to promulgate free trade doctrines in merchandise or manufactures, either, as is evident by his Bill recently introduced in the House, called "An Act for the further promotion of Public Instruction in Upper Canada." Taken altogether it is about as slovenly an Act as we have ever read, and leaves one to guess at several very important points. E. g., County Boards are to meet half yearly and to be entitled to some recompense as County Council members, and their incidental expenses, including remuneration to their Secretary, and if objection is made to any of such expenses, reference is to be had to the County Judge "whose decision shall be final and binding upon the County Council." This last clause leads to the inference that the County Council has to foot the bill. Again, clause 22nd says "that there shall not be more than one Local Superintendent in a county, unless the number of Common Schools in such county exceed 150—nor shall any person be appointed Local Superintendent after the first of January next, who has not experience in teaching, and whose attainments are not attested by the authority appointing him to be above those of a first class teacher.—Each Local Superintendent shall hold office during pleasure, and shall be entitled to not less than five dollars for each school section under his charge; provided always that the Municipal Council of any county may, if it shall judge proper, transfer by resolution the appointment of Local Superintendent of schools for such county to the Department of Public Instruction, &c.—Here again we must infer that the County Council is to appoint the Superintendent, and the only way of getting rid of the difficulty of testing that his abilities "shall be above those of a first class teacher" is to transfer that task to the Department at Toronto. Some of the provisions are good, some very objectionable, and none more so than the one having religious instruction in the School every Friday afternoon. The last half of the Bill is an amendment of the Grammar School act. It was a grave mistake of the Legislature ever to have given the control of the Grammar Schools into the hands of Dr. Ryerson. He has very seriously interfered with their efficiency, and he now proposes to have them more under his thumb than ever. After 1st January 1861 no person shall be employed as Head Master of a Grammar School who has not in addition to a certificate of good moral character one under the hand and official seal of the Chief Superintendent of Education!

The Head Master of a Grammar School in a County town shall be allowed $4 weekly extra for taking and reporting the meteorological observations as required by law to the satisfaction of said chief. Who pays the money? The Grammar School fund is to be apportioned to counties upon the same terms and conditions as the Fund provided by the Legislature in aid of Common Schools. The aim here seems to be to bring down the Grammar Schools and have them as completely subservive to him as the other schools. All that is wanting now is to seize the University, and bring it down to a level with Victoria College, and he will have the control of the entire public Educational institutions of the country. He has tried this before, but got mubbed. If Darcy McGee has made it the business of his life to give "more power to the Pope" Dr. Ryerson has for his motto "more power to myself." Pope Pius and Pope Egerton are both mighty fond of power, the former receives it as a homage, the latter takes it to himself, and a venal ministry acquiesce in the assumption. He is in a fair way, however, of over-shooting the mark—he may do well enough for Common Schools, but when he claims to be the dictator to his betters—and will prohibit a duly qualified classical teacher from being engaged without his concurrence, it is high time for the people to look out for themselves.

The Melodeons gave their performances as announced. On Saturday night the hall was crowded, and the entertainment was highly creditable to the troupe.—When will deserves the title of "Champion bone-player." The Melodeons intend to visit Peterboro' again, in about a month.

Blackwood's Magazine for April contains the usual number of interesting articles. "Lady Hamilton" is an excellent production; "Norman Sinclair," (biography) is continued through this number with no less interest than former ones. We [illegible] call attention to the advertisement of Leonard Scott & Co., in another column; no lover of literature should be without the Magazine and Quarterly Reviews; the price of the whole five publications is only $10 per annum; $20 less than is charged for the same publications in Britain.

Quebec Correspondence.

Money expended without the sanction of Parliament in order to purchase public support.—Upper Canada pays for Lower Canada's Police.—Speaker Smith gets $2,000 for a pleasure trip. The French get $30,000 for a Montreal Fair.—The Government desire Election Frauds, and vote against improving the system.—The Conviction Restitutions.

Quebec, April 30, 1860.

The government expended last year $281,000 without the sanction of Parliament. This is contrary to the clear and equitable interpretation of the constitution. It is one of the safe guards of the people that every expenditure shall be voted by the people's representatives. Our government has no hesitation however in squandering off hundreds of thousands of dollars on its own authority and afterwards comes down to a corrupt Parliament and obtains its sanction. Mr Brown yesterday moved a motion in condemnation of this practice, but it was voted down by 64 to 42. It is a very convenient thing for a corrupt government to be able to expend money to purchase support, and after it is expended to get ratification by the House, but this practice is most dangerous, and were not our representatives lost to every sense of justice they would not be the more willing tools of the Administration and endorse their acts.

The Opposition have made several attempts while the estimates for the current year were under discussion to secure an expression of opinion against several items that are very objectionable. The Cities of Montreal and Quebec do not pay their police by local taxation, but require moneys from the public chest for that purpose.—Mr. Brown moved to compel them to do so; of course without effect.

There has been great jobbery in connection with the public printing. Mr. Brown moved to have the statutes printed by public tender. Although Derbishire & Desbarats charged $7 per volume for the Consolidated Statutes, and it has been proved that they cost them only $2 per volume, yet the House voted that they should still do the Printing.

$60,000 has been paid for years to the Beauport Lunatic Asylum, situated a few miles from Quebec, and yet no return has ever been presented as to the manner in which the expenditure has been made. Mr. Brown asked that returns should be presented before so large a sum should be again voted. He pleaded in vain.

Speaker Smith goes to England on a pleasure trip, and carries the Address of both Houses to the Queen requesting her to visit Canada. The Government now coolly ask the House to vote him $2,000 for the service! And it is voted! That is the way the money is spent.

Lower Canada demands $20,000 for a fair at Montreal on the occasion of the Prince's visit. Although the Victoria Bridge will be the great feature of attraction on that occasion, and the exhibition that Canada can make of her manufactures to a British Prince will be contemptible, yet the French demand the money and will get it. We have a great river—large lakes, and immense natural resources, but we will only show the nakedness of the land when we attempt a display of manufactures. McDougal moved that the sum proposed to be set apart completely for Lower Canada, should be divided between Upper and Lower Canada. His notice was voted down. What more fair than that Upper Canada should have equal sum? She pays two-thirds of the revenue, yet the French demand the whole of the money!

The Government do not desire any change in the Electoral laws that would have the effect of securing purity of elections.

Messrs. McDougall and Gowan have introduced bills that would have the effect, if in the Statute book, of checking bribery and corruption at elections, to a great extent. These Bills have been consolidated by the Committee to whom they were referred. When the consolidated bill was before the House on Friday, the Attorney General for Upper Canada spoke at great length against the bill. The fact is the government have everything to gain by such elections as those of Russell and Quebec. Their tools are by such frauds enabled to get into Parliament and once there government election Committees are selected to try their cases, and they (as in the Quebec elections) will be permitted to set three sessions before they come to adjudicated upon. The Home went into committee on the bill in spite of the government, by a vote of 45 to 34. The Ministry I hear will try and put the vote off. If they do, the people will know how to reward them who vote against reforming election proceedings.

The resolutions of the Convention are to come up on Monday afternoon for debate. Foley and Conner were successful in postponing the debate for a week with Ministerial aid. It is said a scheme is on foot to prevent a vote on them. We will see.

The obstruction in the river at Blythe Mills was successfully raised on Monday last, and on Tuesday several crafts passed through.

☞ No business transacted in the Town Council on Tuesday night; there were not a quorum present.

Communications.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

Mr. Editor,—The new School Bill has appeared at last, and both the obnoxious measures talked of here, free Schools and compulsory attendance are left out. But there is enough of mischief in it still to lead me to wish it may not pass. It is an insidious measure, apparently meaning little, like the locusts in the hedge, but introducing a principle which, like the same locusts on the wing, will devour everything. Section 17 in regard to Ministers teaching in the Common Schools, is simply absurd at present. The Saturday Holiday, and the dandelion of Union Schools is a step to induce the refractory patients to swallow the whole dose. The main object of the Bill is to throw the whole management of the Public Schools, both Common and Grammar Schools, into the hands of the Chief Superintendent. This is brought forward in a very covert way, and amounts to this: the County Council is to be obliged to provide £75, at least, for every Grammar School in the County.—There is to be only one Local Superintendent for each County, who must have such qualifications as a teacher that scarcely any one in the county is likely to have them, and then a nominee of the Chief Superintendent is to be appointed in place. The Chief Superintendent is to decide on all School matters, and if he deem it proper to take legal advice, he may do so. Local Superintendents thus appointed and holding their situations worth from £150 to £200 a year, (five dollars being charged each school for this purpose) at his pleasure, are under him to rule the Schools at his nod, and who can these Local Superintendents be, pray, under such a chief? The whole Bill is couched in soft and plausible phrases, but there is a snake in the grass. I warn you to oppose the Macedonian in time, or be for ever enslaved.

I am, Mr. Editor,
Yours truly,
PHOCION.

Peterboro', April 28th, 1860.

To the Editor of the Examiner.

Mr. Editor,—Permit me once again reluctantly to trespass on your pages, that I may say that I quite agree with your correspondent Mr Voluntary, in his logic that an Established School is merely a part and the lowest part of an Established Church; only with this difference between the old establishment and the new, that the old was a voluntary act; the good man who built a Church, thinking he might be allowed to enter it, and then complete it by building and endowing a school in connection with it; whereas now, a party gets into the government and then taxes others to pay whether they will or not. But besides all this, an attempt has been made to add compulsory attendance, an extreme of tyranny which Protestants can never submit to, in either case. But Mr Voluntary is wrong in his statement regarding the Review, who cannot contradict Zero, because Zero gave the Lower Canada Superintendent's Report in his own words; to the effect that he (Lower Canada Superintendent) declares that the best European Teachers are opposed to the so-called free schools and that a fee in some form should be charged for every child, thus keeping up the principle that parents should educate their own children, as in Athens, a state of freedom, and not that the state should provide for them as in Sparta, a state of slavery. Mr Voluntary however should beware of touching on matters which he either does not know or wilfully misrepresents, and he should reflect that to lie in ignorance, is only to lie doubly, since as so doing, besides the common lie, he claims a knowledge of what he does not possess. The twisting of inferences and all insinuations whether broad or thin go for nothing with me. My object is simply the promotion of sound and liberal education, which I think threatened by unconstitutional measures, and every true friend of education must therefore be a friend of Mr Editor,

yours truly,
ZERO.

STATE CHURCHES.

Mr. Editor,—Is Canada West ere long to have a Church Establishment? Some are of opinion that such a thing may happen, though it may be distant; and some may, when they read this, pronounce the whole a mere chimera. But let me ask such, "If you endow a Sectarian Institution such as Victoria College, out of the funds of a nation, why not a Church?" Church Establishments have always been the unblushing advocates of mental slavery. They are unquestionably "great marrels," and are surely deserving of grateful support, because they abrogate the labour of thinking, and dispense with the fatiguing task of inquiry and private judgment, and with it the perplexities often attendant thereon! He who enters within the precincts of an establishment, bows his neck to the yoke at the portals, and having pronounced the required shibboleth, sacrificed to the idol uniformity, and registered his consent and belief to the required propositions, be they perspicuous or mysterious, consistent or discrepant: having renounced liberty of thought, surrendered his judgment, and enslaved his convictions, he prostrates himself before the authority which stamps him slave, and which being to him more potent than conscience, as the arbiter of right, exonerates him from the consequences of belief. State Churches have, in fact, reversed the legitimate operation of the intellectual powers; nay, with awful presumption they have done the same with the teachings of inspiration. "The very religion which came from God has been employed to rear the Inquisition, and kindle fires for the martyr." Christianity has no tendency to break the human spirit or to make man a slave. It contains nothing narrowing or depressing, and nothing of the littleness of systems, which craft or ambition have engendered. It contains no yoke of ceremonies; no outward religion. It is a State Church which peremptorily decrees to the mind hitherto shalt thou come but no further; which draws a line, beyond which no energy must presume to pass, which describes a circle, whose magic boundaries, must for ever confine the knowledge and information of man. But their might and power have passed the meridian. Knowledge is its outward flood has long since swept beyond the altar which supports their pedestrous foundation; and as each succeeding wave is silently advancing they truly indicate the extent of the progress of moral and intellectual powers, as arms against this giant evil, which has been in every age the ally of the tyrant and the foe of religious liberty.

Your correspondent, "J. E." has written ably and well concerning the College Question. I'd like to see "J. E." or some other of your correspondents put about writing a few essays on "State Churches, their past and present history." Such an event would prove highly interesting to all your readers.

Yours truly,

In the Bank of England no fewer than sixty folio volumes, or ledgers, are daily filled with writing in keeping the accounts! To produce these sixty volumes the paper having been previously manufactured elsewhere, eight men, three steam presses, and two hand presses are continually kept going within the bank! In the copper-plate department 28,000 bank notes are thrown off daily; and so accurately is the number indicated by machinery, that to purloin a single note, without detection, is an impossibility.

The International Fight

BY THE "VANDERBILT."

Sandy Hook, April 28.

The great fight took place on Tuesday, the 17th instant, at Farnborough, near Aldershot. The fight lasted two hours and thirteen minutes. Thirty-seven rounds were fought, when the people rushed into the ring, and Sayer's referee was crowded out. The populace were then ordered to desist from fighting by the referee. Both men went to grass on the last round.—Sayers fell almost every round in the first dozen rounds. Sayers was knocked completely off his legs. Tom's arm, owing to severe fighting, suffered much. Heenan's eyes were quite blackened up towards the last, and at the last round was quite blind. Heenan showed splendid fighting throughout the contest. Heenan drew much more punishment than Sayers. Tom drew first blood. In the 10th round Heenan completely lifted Tom from the ground, and threw him heavily. The eighth round lasted 20 minutes. The seventh round lasted 13 minutes. Wonderful skill was displayed on both sides. Tom was easily knocked off his pins. It is unknown if they will fight again. The fight was doubted to be a drawn one. The opinion of the public was divided regarding who was the best man.

(From the Daily News, April 18.)

This long projected fight between Heenan and Sayers took place yesterday. By four o'clock in the morning, the visitors to the scene of action were conveyed to the London Bridge station, and they alighted near Farnborough. The fight lasted two hours and three minutes, during which thirty-seven rounds were fought. Sayers drew the first blood, and Heenan claimed the first knock down blow. Sayers did not show any signs of punishment, but his right arm was much injured by his attempts to ward off Heenan's tremendous blows. Heenan once got the champion's head under his arm, and seemed about to strangle him. The referee subsequently quitted the ring, and declared a drawn battle; Heenan seeming indifferent as to whether he hit Sayers or his second.

The mob of people at the fight was immense. Long before four o'clock this (Tuesday) morning, London Bridge station was literally besieged by spectators to witness the fight, and at half-past four o'clock precisely, the first special train was despatched, containing about one thousand persons, and after travelling to a place called Ash, near Farnborough, where all the people got out of the train, when, after crossing several fields, they arrived at a snug meadow in which a rope ring had been formed, and precisely at half-past seven the two men entered the ring, when the Benecia Boy approached Sayers and shook hands warmly with him.

First round—Sayers led out with his left and caught Heenan in the mouth, and upon a second feint, he landed a significant blow on Heenan's nose, when the latter closed and got hold of Sayers by the neck, and Sayers fell.

Second—Heenan landed a crasher on Sayers' mouth and sent him spinning to the ground. It was now plainly seen that Sayers' right arm was not of much avail to him from the repeated stopping of blows, and swollen from the repeated use he had made of it.

Third—Heenan caught Sayers on the mouth, the latter again falling.

Fourth—Heenan went up to Sayers, shot out tremendously with his left, and hit Sayers again on the mouth, and sent him spinning to the ground.

In the fifth and subsequent rounds Sayers fell without any punishment being given on either side.

Seventh—Sayers landed a fearful blow on Heenan's left cheek, cut it open, and Heenan' left eye became almost immediately in darkness. This round lasted twelve minutes, and ended with Heenan knocking Sayers down by a blow in the mouth.—Heenan, after a few minutes sparing of his antagonist, let fly his left down by a blow in the mouth.

Eight—Heenan shot out his left, but was beautifully stopped with Sayer's right. After much parleying on both sides, Heenan caught Sayers on the mouth, and caused the claret to flow profusely. This round lasted twenty minutes, and ended with Heenan knocking Sayers down.

Ninth—Heenan went up to Sayers, caught him in the mouth, and sent him to mother earth. Betting, which had been up to this time 2 to 1 on Sayers, rose to even, Heenan having the call.

Tenth—Heenan closed, and threw Sayers heavily.

Eleventh—Sayers struck Heenan in the mouth and fell.

Twelfth—Heenan went up to Sayers and knocked him down, which he also did on the thirteenth round.

Fourteenth—Counter-hitting on both sides in the mouth, then closed, and Sayers fell.

Fifteenth—Heenan caught Sayers in the mouth with his left and sent him spinning round, and caught him with the right on the jaw, Sayers going down.

Sixteenth—After a few exchanges, Heenan shot out and knocked Sayers down.

The seventeenth was a similar round to the.

Eighteenth—Sayers did much towards closing Heenan's right eye and felt.

Nineteenth and twentieth rounds they closed, Heenan throwing Sayers in both instances.

In the twenty-first and twenty-second rounds Heenan went up to Sayers and knocked him down. (Loud cheers.) Betting four to one on Heenan.

Twenty-third—After some severe hitting on both sides, Heenan's face became much disfigured, they closed, and Sayers had a throw recorded in his favour.

Twenty-fourth—Heenan again knocked Sayers down.

Twenty-fifth—Sayers caught Heenan a peter on the nose, the claret flying about. The two closed and fell, Sayers under.

Twenty-sixth—Sayers landed a severe blow on Heenan's left cheek and fell.

Twenty-seventh — Heenan followed Sayers about the ring. Slight counter-hitting. The former landed another on Sayers' mouth and he fell.

Twenty-eight—A similar round to the last, Sayers falling.

Twenty-ninth—Heenan, with his left, caught Sayers in the mouth and brought him to the ground.

Thirtieth—Sayers caught Heenan a bang on the nose; the two closed, and Sayers again fell.

Thirty-first—Sayers landed a severe blow on the mouth; the two closed and fell, Sayers under.

Thirty-second—In this round Heenan retired to his corner, and seemed rather reluctant. At calling out, Sayers, looking at him pointedly, let fly with his left and gave a telling blow on Heenan's disfeatured, letting even on Sayers.

Thirty-third—Heenan landed a counter on Sayers.

At this time it was evident that daylight was becoming clearer of an still Heenan, as both his eyes were nearly closed and his face altogether presented a frightful appearance.

Thirty-fourth—Sayers hit out rapidly twice giving it to Heenan but not the nose and mouth. Heenan, however, followed Sayers and struck him heavily in the mouth and sent him to the ground.

Thirty-fifth—The two were closed and Sayers held off Heenan by the neck and let him severely on the left eye.

Thirty-sixth—The two closed and Sayers was thrown.

Thirty-seventh—Heenan gave Sayers one in the mouth, and a heavy fibbing.

Thirty-eighth—Sayers closed and fell. Heenan gave Sayers one on the head, when he had almost punished the ground. A question of foul play was raised, but it was not persevered in, being considered an accident. Heenan got his arm around Sayers neck, and to all appearances was strangling him. Cries of "Let him go" were raised. Heenan, however, stuck to his hold and the ring was broken in. The greatest confusion prevailed. The umpire was carried away in the throng, and the fight was prematurely brought to a close, neither having been declared the winner. The contest lasted two hours and eight minutes.

THE CONTEST.

From the London Times, April 18th.

There was a minutes pause after the final shaking hands, when the seconds retired and left the antagonists face to face at last. Both instantly put themselves into position—the right hand held close across the body, the left advanced at length, and kept moving gently out as if to feel its way. The immense difference between the height, weight, strength, and length of arm of the men was now more than ever manifest, and the disadvantages under which Sayers lay bored appeared to many to be too much for him. The sun shone bright and full in his face, so as almost to blind him; yet, Sayers seemed so fresh and confident, and smiled coolly as he ventured in reach of that tremendous muscular arm. Both are said very cautious. The feint were quick and constant, and as each avoided the other with more or less agility neither could help laughing.

The fight continued for two hours and six minutes, during which 37 rounds were fought. We omit the details of these rounds. Once in the early stages of the fight, says the Times "a shout went round the ring that Sayers had virtually already lost, and indeed the punishment he had received was so much more severe than that bestowed upon his tall, wiry antagonist, who seemed always a shade, and always fresh, that matters really began to look serious for the champion, and almost to warrant the belief that 'the best was going to Troy.'"

One incident is then related:

It had been noticed in the last two or three rounds that Sayers made not the least use of his right, with which in all his previous contests he had administered such terrible punishment, that a blow from it may almost be said to decide the fate of a battle. The reason of this was soon plainly apparent, as his again stepping into the ring. In stopping one of Heenan's tremendous blows, it is supposed that one of the bones of his right arm was broken. Certain it is that the limb was frightfully swollen, and so powerless that he could only manage to support it across his chest. From this time, therefore, Sayers fought the rest of the battle with his left hand, only making every opportunity to save the evident pain of the injured limb by opening the hand and resting it on his chest or ribs. He however, advanced smiling, as did also Heenan though the features of the latter were so distorted and swollen that it was hard to say what he was doing.

(From Bell's Life in London.)

The police at this time [the 37th round] got closer, there was a rush to the ropes from all sides, and we, in company with others, including the referee, were completely shut out from the view. We are informed that the round ended in both going to grass at the expiration of two hours and six minutes. We had hoped that the men would now have been withdrawn, as the referee had been forced from his post, and the police were down by. The battle, as he as it may be called a battle, was for the time over, and the men should have been taken away. We are informed, however, that although the referee s

Being struck in return by some one else in that corner, he turned upon that other party, and, if his fine indignation at the outrageous manner in which the object of his exhibition had been dishonestly wrested from him, he opened a free fight against them all."

The New York Evening Post says that a passenger on the Vanderbilt, who witnessed the fight, gives the following account of the closing scenes: "On the last call of time Heenan came up promptly, and the referee left. Sayers was not up to time, but was sitting on the knee of his second. Heenan, after wresting for him, walked up to him, with his second behind him, and said: "Give me this fight!" To this there was no reply. "Give me this fight, I say!" repeated Heenan; but still there was no reply, and the sponge was not thrown up. Heenan then drew back and slapped Sayers in the face with the palm of his hand, when outsiders rushed in and ended the fight."

THE MAJOR EXCOMMUNICATION.

The following is the form of the "Major Excommunication" hurled at the individual specially excommunicated by the Church of Rome. It would seem, however, from recent letters from Rome, that the bull of excommunication posted up in Rome was general and declaratory; it mentioned no one by name, but stated that the actors, abettors, and abettors of the revolt of the Romagna had incurred the censures of the church):—

"In the name of Almighty God, the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, of the holy canons, of the blessed Virgin Mary, mother of God, and of all the celestial virtues, of the angels, arch-angels, thrones, dominions, powers, of cherubim and seraphim, of the holy patriarchs and prophets, of all the apostles and evangelists, of the holy innocents, who alone were found worthy to sing the new canticle in presence of the Eternal, of the holy martyrs and blessed confessors of all holy virgins, and all the saints chosen by God,—

"We excommunicate and anathematise this robber and malefactor, and sequestrate him from the paths of the Holy Church of Rome, so that condemned to everlasting torments, he should be engulphed with Korah, Dathan and Abiram, and with those who dare to tell the God of might, 'Withdraw thyself from us, for we will not know thy way.' And in the same manner that fire is quenched by water, thus be his soul quenched throughout the eternity of time, unless he recants and comes to resipiscence.

"Be he cursed by God the Father, creator of mankind! Be he accursed by God the Son, by the Holy Ghost, who has descended upon him by baptism! May the holy cross upon which Christ triumphantly ascended for our salvation, secure him! May the Holy Mother of God, Mary, ever virgin, censure him! May St. Michael, the guardian and protector of sacred souls, censure him; and may he also be censured by all the angels, archangels, princes, and pastors, and all the heavenly host.

"May the numerous patriarchs and prophets censure him; may he likewise be censured by St. John Precursor, who poured the water of baptism over Christ. May he be censured by St. Peter, St. Paul, St. Andrew, and all the apostles, and other disciples of Christ, and by the Four Evangelists, whose word has converted the world.

"Be he censured by the marvellous troop of martyrs and confessors, who have been acceptable by their good works; be he censured by the chorus of the sacred virgins, who have despised the goods of this world for the sake of Christ! Be he censured by all the saints who have been acceptable in the eyes of God, from the beginning of the world to the end of centuries. May he be censured by heaven and earth, and everything holy that dwells therein!

"Be he censured wherever he may be, whether in the house or in his field, on the high road or by the by-path, in the forest, [illegible]

EMIGRATION TO CANADA.

We have received and read with great pleasure a pamphlet, which, in 40 pages, contains a great amount of valuable information to intending emigrants than any one we have ever seen. This little work is calculated and intended for distribution in Europe, and has been translated into French, German and Norwegian. The following paragraph fore-shadows the object of the work, the appearance of which is very well-timed, inasmuch as an unusual degree of attention will, this summer, be given to Canada:—

"In Europe it is usual to speak of "America and Americans," when any part of the Northern half of that great continent is referred to, while the existence of "Canada," as a distinct country, is ignored or unknown. The shadow of the great nation of "The United States of America," obscures it, Europeans too often think only of the latter when they give a thought at all to the American Continent. Let it be our place to endeavour them and to show that Canada is a country totally distinct from the United States—free from the blight of slavery and free, too, from many of the faults which have crept into the social and political relations of our Republican neighbors."

The amount of information contained in the pamphlet may be judged by the following table of contents:—"Introduction; Geographical position and extent of Canada; her natural resources and advantages; Minerals; Metals; Ores; Fisheries; Form of Government; Character of her Population; Laws and Municipal and Educational Institutions; Religion; Agricultural capabilities; Value of Land; Free Grants; Climate; Trade and Revenue; Wages; Land Regulations; Required Outfit; Routes, Distances and Rates of Passages; Protection to Emigrants, &c., &c.—Quebec Mercury.

GOVERNMENT BILLS.

The following is a short summary of legal Bills introduced by Mr. John A. Macdonald:

The object of the Bills introduced by Mr. Attorney-General Macdonald, in respect to Barristers and Attorneys-at-Law, is to enact that in future persons desiring to avail themselves of a three years servitude on the books of the Law Society, or under articles to an Attorney, as distinguished from a period of five years, must have taken the degrees of B.A. or L.L.B. before entering upon such period of apprenticeship. This has been found a necessary measure, as it has become the habit of some scholastic and legal studies contemporaneously, to the manifest detriment of either one or the other, or both. It may, however, be consolatory to those gentlemen who have hitherto entered on the study of the Law to know that "vested rights" are exempted as to those who may have become students prior to the first of March last.

Two other measures of interest were also brought before the House. The one contemplates the abolition of what has been hitherto known as the "Inferior Jurisdiction" of the Superior Courts, that is to say, the bringing of suits within the jurisdiction of a County Court in the Superior Courts.

It will, however, be still within the power of professional gentlemen, under the existing enactment of the Common Law Procedure Act, to bring such inferior suits in Superior Courts, but at the peril of costs, as to which it requires the certificate of the presiding judge that the suit in question involved a matter fit to be tried in a superior court.

The other Bill provides that the removal of suits, by certiorari or otherwise, from the County Court to the Superior Court, must be effected by application on affidavit, and good cause shown to a judge of the latter courts for such removal.

This latter measure had been rendered very necessary, from the abuse which had grown lately into practice of removing suits from one court to another, for the purpose of delay, involving considerable injury and increased costs to the suitor.

NEW YORK MYSTERIES AND MURDERS.

From the N. Y. Commercial Advertiser.

There is a general belief that not a few murders are committed in this city and neighborhood, the "mere mention" of which is never publicly made, even in the most enterprising of sensation papers; while the number of "mysterious disappearances," from which the mystery is for a long time not cleared up, is unquestionably very large. The cause of these latter, however, can in many cases be guessed at by the relatives of such missing person, which said relatives keep to themselves.

We have been led into this train of remark by the reported fact that thirty persons have applied for permission to see the body of the woman found in the north river near the Canard steamer's dock, Jersey City, in expectation of identifying it as that of a missing relative, friend or acquaintance. Admitting, as we probably ought to admit, that a portion of these persons have been influenced only by a morbid curiosity, the fact must still remain that many of these visitors have really the knowledge that one of their female acquaintances is really and unaccountably missing from her usual circle of friends. Say that only one-half of these inquiries are of that class, and you have the startling conclusion that fifteen females are at the present time missing, leaving the impression on the minds of their friends, that they have been murdered, or committed suicide, or in some way met with an untimely end.

The conclusion we say is a startling one. The matter is one demanding investigation. And the subject widens, and deepens in tragedy, as we indulge in the reflections and reminiscences which it suggests. To the missing women are to be added the missing men of whom the public has not heard beyond the fact that 'the body of a well-dressed man was found,' &c., or perhaps not even that. Such cases we regret to say are not uncommon. Sometimes they are our own citizens. A paragraph appears that "Mr. So-and-so left his house at such a time, known to have a considerable sum of money on his person, and has not since been heard of. His friends fear that he has met with foul play." But what an announcement to be made in a city professedly as well, and really as systematically governed as this. At other times they are visitors to the city, who, leaving their hotel in the morning, with money in their possession, return no more there. Of neither of these cases is the number large. And it had not need be. But we imagine that by a careful scrutiny of the daily papers for the last few years, of the two classes together, at least half a dozen could be found on record on which no light has been thrown either by the finding of the body or any subsequent intelligence of the missing man.

Facts are not pleasant topics, but the case of the murdered woman found in the Canard dock justifies the press in calling attention to them. The existence that that woman was murdered, and that she did not part from by accident or by suicide, seems to be conclusive. But there appears not the slightest clue to the murderer. The inquiries at the coroner's office, even if you reduce the number of really interested inquirers, indicate that many a heart aches at least with a vague fear that some missing friend or relative has met a like fate with this woman, and we repeat, the subject is of that gravity, that a rigid investigation ought to be directed towards it.

AN EAGLE FIGHTS A MAN AND DOG.

—On Tuesday last, as a young man was ploughing in a field on the South Branch, a few miles from town, his attention was attracted by the barking of a bull terrier dog and on looking after him, he discovered the dog engaged in a fight with an enormous eagle. Raising a stick, he ran to the assistance of the terrier, which was receiving the worst of it from the eagle. On approaching, the eagle turned upon his new adversary, and in all probability would have overcome him, had not the faithful dog come to his rescue and renewed the fight. After a short scuffle between the eagle and his two adversaries, he was despatched, and the young farmer carried his carcass home as a trophy of success. He measured nine feet from wing to wing.—Cornwall Freeholder.

IMMENSE CHARITABLE BEQUEST.

We learn from the Charlestown Courier that ga Mr Wm. Easton of that city, who died suddenly of disease of the heart, has left a will, by which, after the death of his wife his whole estate, estimated at from two to five millions of dollars, is given in trust to the city of Charlestown for the establishment and support of a retreat for aged indigent people. No lunatics are to be admitted to it. The city of Charlestown must furnish not less than eight acres of ground for the erection of cottages for the accomodation of the inmates, each cottage to have a small garden. The widow of Mr Easton is to receive the whole income of the estate during her lifetime, with the exception of some liberal bequests and annuities to his brothers and their families, which are to be derived from the income; but the widow's income is not to be reduced below $10,000 a year. Mr Easton was 72 years of age, and a native of Canterbury, England.—After learning the cabinet maker's business he established himself at Philadelphia, but subsequently removed to Charlestown, where he was very successful in the furniture business and in his investments. He owned largely in Cincinatti, Chicago, and other Western cities, as well as in Charlestown.

A CHILD DEVOURED BY RATS.

On Sunday last a poor Irishwoman named Mary Connor, far advanced in pregnancy, made application to be sent to the Belleville Hospital, and was subsequently admitted to that institution and placed with a number of other women in the "waiting ward." She was attended by one of the resident physicians up to a late hour, when he left her for the night. The following morning it was ascertained that she had given birth to a child and that the infant had been attacked by rats, which had eaten off its nose, upper lip, and the toes and about half of the left foot. The child was of course dead, but the mother was not aware of it, being too feeble and exhausted to give any attention to her child. She stated that she had felt the rats in bed during the night, but had not sufficient strength to drive them away.—N. Y. Daily Times.

☞ The Syracuse Standard says that one hundred and fifty-five cars loaded with live stock passed through that city on the Central Road, Friday night last. They were divided into three trains, and ran on time, each train being drawn by two locomotives. This the largest amount of stock that ever passed over that road in one day.

FIENDISH ATTEMPT TO DESTROY A TRAIN OF CARS

MIRACULOUS ESCAPE OF PASSENGERS.

Last Thursday some demon in human shape removed a rail from the track of the St. Louis, Alton and Chicago Railroad, at a point near Springfield, Illinois, where it crosses a deep ravine on trestle work, at an elevation of about thirty feet. An express train, consisting of a baggage car, a 2nd class fixed 1st class passenger car, and a sleeping car, was the first to cross the chasm after the execution of this fiendish plan for the destruction of life. The engine, the baggage car, and the two forward passenger cars were plunged to the bottom of the ravine, leaving only the sleeping car on the track; but extraordinary as it seems, no person or any of them was seriously injured. The Chicago Press and Tribune says:

"The engineer, Mr. Cutter, stuck to his machine, and wonderfully enough, escaped with but few bruises. The fireman leaped off in safety. In the baggage car, the express messenger occupied the forward end. The other contents of the car were a horse and the baggage. The messenger, Mr. Parker, was extricated from beneath the two last, and uninjured. Strange to say, no person in either the second or first class cars were injured so severely as not to be able to resume their journey. A brakesman who was on the front platform of the former car, was pretty severely injured.—Conductor Hedges was in the sleeping car, having just passed through his train. From the first investigation as soon as light could be procured, it seemed that every passenger had escaped uninjured in this leap into a thirty-foot chasm, but on clearing the wreck, the crushed bodies of two young men were found between the tender and the baggage car, where it is supposed they had been secretly stealing a trunk on the platform."

APPALLING SACRIFICE OF LIFE IN THE SLAVE TRADE.

No less than six vessels have left New York within a fortnight for the African coast and the Herald states that all these expected to have negroes for their return cargoes. Among them was a fine clipper ship and a fast sailing brig. One of those terrible wholesale massacres that occasionally occur in the prosecution of this monstrous traffic is graphically described in a letter from St. Paul de Loando, on the African coast, dated Feb. 21st:—

"The principal bit of news is the loss of one of our Baltimore slavers, as fine looking a clipper built hermaphrodite brig as ever was seen in waters. On the 10th of this month, as her Majesty's steamer was cruising to the southward of Cape Lopez they made a sail to leeward. They immediately put her before the wind to give chase, which manœuvre the fellow observing, he immediately followed suit, with a view of rounding Cape Lopez, and probably escaping after nightfall, by running into some small rivers inside of the Bight of Biafra. He proved himself a match, however, for his vessel sailed like a witch and gained on the steamer nearly the whole day, when, at about five o'clock in the afternoon, the Portugese steamer Tagus hove in sight on the weather bow, thus cutting off the fellow's chance of rounding the Cape. Seeing his chance thus lost, he stood her directly on to the rocks of the Cape. Just before sundown the Portugese gave him the contents of several thirty-two pounders, which brought his foretopmast down, and, as it was blowing almost a gale of wind, his jibboom followed directly after. However, the fellow stopped for nothing, and, just as night set in drove her high on the rocks of Cape Lopez, the Portugese steamer by that time being in close range, but the Gloucester was far behind. Those on board the other steamer, how to describe the scene as truly heart-rending. As the brig struck, and was overwhelmed by the breakers, the miserable creatures on board, probably to the number of five hundred, set up a howl of despair that could be heard even above the roaring of the hungry sea. But it was too dark, by that time, to see much, and beyond human skill or power to aid the drowning wretches, so that they soon must have met their doom, for on the next morning the beach inside of the rocks was strewn with corpses, and the fragments of the wreck. Nothing was found, however, to reveal the name of the slaver, or any other information concerning him, save that to the practical seamen she proved of Baltimore build. The monsters who manned the vessel are supposed to have escaped in their boat before she struck, and must have gained the shore, as a boat somewhat stove was discovered on the beach with the oars near by. A good prize was thus lost, and what is worse, probably five hundred human beings were launched into eternity."

EXCITING FUGITIVE SLAVE CASE IN TROY.

Troy, N.Y., April 27, 1860.

At noon to day, U. S. Deputy Marshal Holmes arrested a colored man in this city, named Charles Nalle, as a fugitive from Virginia, the property of B. W. Hailsborough, of Culpepper county. The fugitive was taken before Commissioner Bosch, and witnesses identified him as a fugitive described in the papers. The Commissioner therefore remanded him. Soon after Judge Gould issued a writ of habeas corpus for the fugitive, and the same was served by a Deputy Sheriff of this county. By this time an excited crowd of some one thousand persons had gathered about the Commissioner's office, threatening a rescue. When the fugitive was brought down to be taken before Judge Gould, the crowd surrounded the officers and endeavored to take him from them. A successful resistance was made for some time, but the rescuers finally gained the advantage, when the negro was hurried to the river, where a ferryman was in waiting. He was rowed across, and, upon arriving at the opposite shore, was re-arrested by a West Troy Constable. Here another crowd gathered together, determined to rescue the fugitive. He was taken as quickly as possible to a Justice's office, which the mob surrounded and broke into. They then rescued the fugitive again from the officers and carried him off in a carriage. Blows, pistol shots, and knock downs occurred during the affair, but no one, fortunately, was seriously injured. The colored people were the most active participators in the matter. The greatest excitement existing here in regard to the affair.

—A married man named Bruce, of Northville, Michigan, ran away with a widow some six months ago. Last week he returned home, and was tarred and feathered and ridden on a rail by the villagers.

The Enfield (Abolition) Spectator says that there is an old copper-fastened hulk of the Chesterfield-to-river steamship Ottawa able to navigate from a just sufficient to float herself. She could sail some, on the strength of his fingers, are of a smooth, pale, delicate whiteness, that contrasts very strongly with his sun-burned, parrot Circassian. His lips are of a soft, ruddy hue, and he does it beginning to show the same rudeness, wonderful change.

PEALE'S COURT OF DEATH.

The subscriber is now issuing 100,000 Splendid Coloured Engravings Of Rembrandt Peale's celebrated Original Painting of the Court of Death.

at the unprecedentedly low price of

☞ ONE DOLLAR EACH.☜

The lowest regular price for engravings of the size and quality of this is $3; and in answer to the question "how can they be sold for One Dollar?" the subscriber would state, that instead of issuing 5,000 copies at $3, he issues 100,000 copies at $1. The main expense of such a work is not in the paper and printing, but in getting up the plates. If 5,000 only are sold, $3 is but a fair price. But if 100,000 are sold at $1, the aggregate profits are larger than on the 5,000.

The Original Painting, of which the Engravings are a Fac-simile Copy, was painted by Rembrandt Peale, in the City of Baltimore, in 1820, and has been the study and admiration of tens of thousands of our citizens. It has long been valued at 25,000 Dollars.

Death is personified as a King or Monarch, and there is not a skeleton or anything repulsive in the picture.

There are twenty-three full sized figures in the engravings, and arranged into five groups presenting living representations of DEATH, WAR, SENSUAL PLEASURE, INTEMPERANCE, and the TRIUMPH OF CHRISTIAN FAITH OVER THE TERRORS OF DEATH.

It is a work to delight the eye and nurture the heart. It can be studied and understood by a child, while its sublime conception affords scope to the strongest imagination.

It has been made the subject of special discourse, by Rev. Dr. Sprague, Rev. Dr. Welch, Rev. Dr. Bacon, Rev. Dr. Cleveland, Rev. Dr. Wayland, and others.

A more impressive, instructive, or beautiful Parlor Ornament could not be purchased.

By enclosing ☞ ONE DOLLAR and four letter stamps [to pay postage,] the Engraving will be forwarded, postpaid, rolled in a strong case.

SUNDAY SCHOOLS supplied at a liberal discount.

CLERGYMEN can add at least fifty dollars per year to their income [in commission] by interesting themselves in the distribution, and at the same time place in the hands of each subscriber, (what President Hale calls) "a sermon on canvas."

Any person sending $5, shall receive a sixth copy gratis postpaid.

Agents.—Gentlemen or Ladies can make handsome profits by taking subscriptions for this beautiful work. One dollar and six stamps from Agents, for one copy and a letter of Agency stating special terms.

Until the duplicate plates are finished only 300 engravings can be furnished per day—but they will be forwarded in the order of receipt of subscription.

Where less than $10 are sent in one letter, better get a draft, or have the letter registered.

To avoid mistakes, the NAME, TOWN, COUNTY and STATE should be PLAINLY written.

RESPECTFULLY SHEWETH,

That your Auditors beg leave to submit to you the Abstract and Detailed Statement of the Receipts and Expenditures of the Town of Peterborough for the past year under the proper heading and dates.

That they have to express as their humble opinion, that the system in which the account books of the Town are now kept, is incomplete and unsatisfactory, inasmuch as all the transactions of the year, are not therein embraced in proper form—the bills payable and receivable, as well as Interest and Discount accounts are especially irregular.

While respectfully recommending an improvement in the present system, they have much pleasure in testifying to the correctness of your Treasurer.

LAND DRAINAGE.

The first step towards legislation on the important subject of the drainage of land, has been taken by Mr. Bristow, who has introduced a Bill intituled, "An Act to facilitate the drainage of land in Canada."—The main objects of this bill, as we understand them, are to establish a mode of giving and enforcing security upon the land improved by drainage, to the contractor, or other person who may advance the money for the work to be already undertaken thereon, and also to provide a uniform system of procedure by requiring all operations carried on under the authority of the act to have the sanction of a Board of Commissioners formed for the purpose. The first step to be taken by a party desirous of going to work under the provisions of this act, is to enter into a contract either for a loan of money to enable him to carry on the improvements himself, or with them to do it for him. This contract is to specify the nature of the estate which the applicant has in the land, the estimated value and description of the property, the amount to be expended with various other particulars mentioned in the act; to the contract is also to be annexed a plan of the lands and of the proposed improvements, a copy of which is to be deposited with the Registrar of the county in which the property is situated.—These preliminaries all agreed upon, a certified abstract of the title to the property is to be deposited with the Commissioners, and if any, other parties are interested in the land by way of mortgage or otherwise, their consent must be obtained before any further steps are taken. When the Commissioners are satisfied with regard to title of the applicant, and also that the proposed improvements will be of benefit to the land, they are to make an order directing that the contract shall be executed, and declaring that the amount to be expended under it with all the expenses incurred, shall be a charge upon the land when the work is completed. The work then proceeds, and when it is finished it is to be inspected by an engineer named by the commissioners, and being reported by him as satisfactory, and in accordance with the specifications, a final order is issued by the commissioners making the amount expended a first charge on the property, subject only to local rates. The charge may at any time be redeemed by the payment of the principal, which is to bear interest at a rate not exceeding eight per cent. This charge is recoverable by distress like any other rent charge, from the person in possession of the property, and so long as the rent charge continues, the improvement made must be properly kept up by the person paying it. It is further provided that when the company which has advanced the money or done the work has the rent charge properly secured, it may issue debentures equal to the amount secured by the rent charge, an account of which is to be kept by the commissioners, who are to see that no debentures are issued beyond the amount so secured.

These are the principal provisions of the Act, and they certainly deserve the attentive consideration of the agricultural community. Whether the machinery proposed to carry out the plan could be rendered more simple may be a matter for consideration, but that great advantages would result from a uniform and scientific method of procedure there can be no question. This Act it will be seen, provides for no Government aid, either in the way of collateral security, or otherwise.

Fossil Elephants, the remains of which are found abundantly in the upper tertiary strata of England, formed the subject of a lecture lately delivered in London by Professor Owen. The fossil elephants, or mastodons found in England, are principally distinguished from the living species by their detention, particularly in the difference in their tusks. The mastodon had two tusks in the lower jaw as well as the upper, the teeth were smaller and more numerous, and there was a marked difference in the form of the transverse ridges of enamel.—Numerous fossil bones of elephants have been discovered in the upper strata of America, but those animals had only one tusk in the lower jaw. The first tusks of the young animal are shed like the milk teeth in front, and the subsequent ones are produced by a gradual formation of the substance of the ivory, which, from being pulpy, hardens as it grows. Professor Owen mentioned the circumstance of an iron bullet having been found imbedded in the centre of an elephant's tusk, without any indication how it got there, and said the ball must have been lodged in the pulpy part of the tusk when the animal was young, and that the ivory having formed round it, in the progress of growth, the ball had been pushed from the root of the tusk to the centre.

SALT MAKING IN GODERICH.

On Saturday last we paid a visit to the salt works in this town, to ascertain the latest developments in that line. We found actively engaged in hauling out from a couple of boiling cauldrons, shovelfuls of the clearest, whitest, and most beautiful common salt we ever have seen. At the time of our visit, we should judge two or three bushels of salt had been taken out and more to come.—Quite a number of citizens and strangers were present, witnessing the first satisfactory and successful manufacturing of salt at this place, and each visitor carried away a portion of the products—a lump of the most positive evidence of what had been done.—Signal.

LOW WATER IN THE ST. LAWRENCE.—We are informed by persons familiar with the subject that the water in the St. Lawrence and its tributaries is lower this season than it has been for years. Of course this will not be felt in the navigation of the St. Lawrence; but we fear it will result seriously to the business of the tributaries. The Salmon River, it is said, is very shallow, and it requires the a most skill to navigate the Bouquet upon it. We fear this is not the only case. It is said that the Massena route will be seriously affected by the low water. It is to be hoped that a plentiful supply of spring rain will remedy this state of things.—Free Press.

This Machine has just been patented, and has great advantages over any other for the same purpose, now known or in use. It is so simple that any farmer can use it, and it requires but a small amount of power to drive it, two horse power being sufficient; with this amount of power of any kind, it will grind from 18 to 25 bushels of Oats per hour. The grain is ground or rather cut by cast-steel cutters, which are so fitted into the Machine, that they can easily be taken out and repaired at a trifling cost.

All sorts of Grain can be ground without altering or adjusting the Machine.

PRICE $30.00.

PHONOGRAPHY, OR WRITING BY SOUND!!

PHONOGRAPHY was Invented by ISAAC PITMAN, of Bath, England, in the year 1837. It is the most simple, most natural, most rapid, and most easily learned system of writing which has ever been, or ever can be invented.

During the past fifteen years, hundreds of thousands of persons, in England and America, in both public and private life, have learned to write Phonography, and thousands of social and business letters annually pass through the post office.

Nor is the great popularity to be wondered at. The present system of writing is exceedingly cumbersome, and totally unworthy these days of progress and invention. Phonography is equally as legible, can be learned in one twentieth the time, and can be written six times as fast! In other words, the labor of six days can be performed in one—one man can do the work of six! So simple is the system, too, that a person may learn to write it slowly, in a couple of hours. An hour's daily practice for a few weeks will enable any person to write Phonography with certainty, and with some degree of freedom. The same amount of practice continued for six months will enable a person to take reports of ordinary lectures, sermons, or conversation, and report them with accuracy.

The late Hon. Thos. H. Benton, upon being presented with a verbatim report of one of his masterly speeches, taken by a little boy only twelve years of age, said: "But this art has known 40 years ago it would have saved me 20 years hard labor." The learned senator spoke but a portion of the truth. What long-hand requires six years to accomplish, Phonography will perform in one.

To clergymen, Editors, Physicians, Lawyers, Secretaries, Conveyancers, Law and Medical Students, Lecturers, Painters, School Teachers, Merchants, School Boys and Girls, a knowledge of Phonography is of vast utility. In fact there is no profession or calling in which it is not useful, and no young man's education can be considered complete without it.

During the past 9 months hundreds of persons in Canada, of every pursuit in life, have acquired the Art, from many of whom the subscriber has received neatly-written phonographic letters, expressive of their delight with the attainment, and the extraordinary ease with which they have acquired it.

For the purpose of aiding in the dissemination of so important a reform in his own country, the subscriber is now prepared to supply all who apply, with the MANUEL OF PHONOGRAPHY, and the PHONOGRAPHIC COPY BOOK, sent by mail to any part of the Province, postage pre-paid, for the small sum of ONE DOLLAR.

Anybody and everybody, who can learn anything, can learn PHONOGRAPHY from the MANUAL without other assistance. Those who wish to be able to put their thoughts to paper at the rate of from 100 to 250 words per minute, should send for the above-mentioned works at once. The instruction given by the Manual is as plain as A. B. C., and ten times as easy to understand.

"STARTLING BUT TRUE. SURVIVE OR PERISH.

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS

The history of this great remedy is the most wonderful medical revelation that the world has ever known. It is not a history written by one man, or even derived from the experience of one nation, but consists of a compilation of testimonials from the sick of every country—a record, the like of which has never been adduced in favour of any discovery or invention since time began.

BILIOUS DISORDERS.

In whatever form disease attacks the liver, it is repelled and exterminated by this searching, painless and irresistible curative.

Let the sick whom the faculty have abandoned rejoice with confidence in this antibilious agent, and a restoration to health and activity will be the unvarying result.

DYSPEPSIA.

The great scourge of this continent yields quickly to a course of these antiseptic Pills and the digestive organs are restored to their proper tone; no matter in what hideous shape this hydra of disease exhibits itself, this nourishing and unerring remedy disperses it from the patient's system.

GENERAL DEBILITY AND WEAKNESS.

From whatever cause, however or remote, and all other signs of a diseased liver, and other disorganization of the system, vanish under the eradicating influence of this all powerful antiseptic and detergent remedy.

SICKLY FEMALES

Should lose no time in trying a few doses of this regulating and renovating remedy; whatever may be their complaint, it can be taken with safety in all periodical and other disorganizations; its effect is all but miraculous.

Holloway's Pills are the best remedy known in the world for the following diseases:

Asthma,	Headaches,
Bowel Complaints,	Indigestion,
Coughs,	Influenza,
Colds,	Inflammation,
Chest Diseases,	Inward Weakness
Costiveness,	Liver Complaints,
Dyspepsia,	Lowness of Spirits,
Diarrhœa,	Piles,
Dropsy,	Stone and Gravel,
Debility,	Secondary Symptoms,
Fever and Ague,	Venereal Affections.
Female Complaints,	Worms of all kinds.

☞ CAUTION!—None are genuine unless the words "Holloway, New York and London," are discernible as a Water-mark in every leaf of the book of directions around each pot or box; the same may be plainly seen by holding the leaf to the light. A handsome reward will be given to any one rendering such information as may lead to the detection of any party or parties counterfeiting the medicines or vending the same, knowing them to be spurious.

 Sold at the Manufactory of Professor Holloway, 80 Maiden Lane, New York, and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicine throughout the United States and the civilized world, in boxes at 25 cents, 63 cents and $1 each.

☞ There is considerable saving by taking the larger sizes.

N. B.—Directions for the guidance of patients in every disorder are affixed to each box.

PRACTICAL EXPERIENCE,

BETTER THAN

EXPERIMENTAL SCIENCE.

HOLLOWAY'S OINTMENT.

CONSOLATION FOR THE SUFFERING.

Nearly fifty years continual use in every part of the habitable globe, amongst the savage and the civilized alike, has proved that simple preparations, open sores, hard tumors, scrofulous developments of all kinds, abscesses, cancers, old wounds, and, in one word, every species of disfiguration and suppuration, whether in the skin, the flesh, the glands, or among the muscles, can be arrested and permanently cured, without danger, by rubbing in and using as a dressing, this inestimable Ointment.

SCROFULA, ERYSIPELAS, AND SALT RHEUM, ERUPTIONS OF THE SKIN, PILES, AND FESTULA,

No remedy has ever done so much for the cure of diseases of the Skin, whatever form they may assume, as this Ointment. No case of Salt Rheum, Scurvy, Sore Heads, Scrofula or Erysipelas, can long withstand its influence.

BAD LEGS, OLD SORES, ULCERS, &c.

Cases of many years standing that have pertinaciously refused to yield to any other remedy or treatment, have invariably succumbed to a few applications of this powerful ungruent.

Arising from a bad state of the blood or chronic disease, are scattered, and a clear as a transparent surface regained by the restorative action of this Ointment. It surpasses many of the cosmetics and other toilet appliances in its power to dispel rashes and other disfigurements of the face.

Every form and feature of those prevalent and stubborn disorders is eradicated locally and entirely by the use of this emollient; warm fomentations should precede its application. Its healthy qualities will be found to be thorough and invariable.

Both the Ointment and Pills will be used in the following cases:

Bunions,	Skin Diseases,
Burns,	Swelled Glands,
Chapped Hands,	Sore Legs,
Chilblains,	Sore Breasts,
Fistula,	Sore Heads
Gout,	Sore Throats,
Lumbago,	Sores of all kinds,
Mercurial Eruptions,	Sprains,
Piles,	Stiff Joints,
Rheumatism,	Tetter,
Ringworm,	Ulcers,
Salt Rheum,	Venereal Sores,
Scalds,	Wounds of all kinds.

☞ CAUTION!—None are genuine unless the words "Holloway, New York and London" are discernible as a Water-mark in every leaf of the book of directions around each pot or box; the same may be plainly seen by holding the leaf to the light. A handsome reward will be given to any one rendering such information as may lead to the detection of any party or parties counterfeiting or vending the same, knowing them to be spurious.

 Sold at the manufactory of Professor Holloway, 80 Maiden Lane, New York, and by all respectable Druggists and Dealers in Medicine throughout the United States and the civilized world, in pots at 25 cents, 63 cents, and $1 each.

Detailed Statement
OF THE
RECEIPTS & EXPENDITURES,
of the Town of Peterborough, for the Year 1859.

Auditor's Report & Detailed Statement.

TO THE MAYOR AND TOWN COUNCIL OF THE TOWN OF PETERBOROUGH:—

The Report of the Auditors of the Town of Peterborough,

RESPECTFULLY SHEWETH,

That your Auditors beg leave to submit to you the Abstract and Detailed Statement of the Receipts and Expenditures of the Town of Peterborough for the past year under the proper heading and dates.

That they have to express as their humble opinion, that the system in which the account books of the Town are now kept, is incomplete and unsatisfactory, inasmuch as all the transactions of the year, are not therein embraced in proper form—the bills payable and receivable, as well as Interest and Discount accounts are especially irregular.

While respectfully recommending an improvement in the present system, they have much pleasure in testifying to the correctness of your Treasurer.
